Page 65, line 3, strike out the word "Aqueduct" and insert in lieu thereof the word "Georgetown."

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be agreed to.

There was no objection.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I ask to return to page 102, line 17.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the paragraph passed over on page 102 and the pending amendment.

Page 102, line 17: "Okanogan project, Washington: For operation and maintenance, continuation of construction, and incidental operations, $196,000."

Also the following amendment was read:

Amendment by Mr. WEBSTER: Page 102, line 17, after the word "operations," strike out "$196,000" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "$666,000: Provided, That no part of the moneys hereby appropriated shall become available for the construction of a permanent pumping plant until such action has been taken as may be satisfactory to the Secretary of the Interior to relieve the lands of the Okanogan project from liability for the obligations of the Methoy-Okanogan irrigation district to the extent deemed necessary by the said Secretary to fully safeguard the interests of the United States for the funds invested in that project."

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair wishes to state that a point of order is pending.

Mr. GOOD. I withdraw my reservation of the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Idaho is recognized on the amendment.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I want to direct the attention of the House for just a few minutes to the importance of the amendment of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. WEBSTER].

A very critical situation confronts the Government and confronts the settlers upon the Okanogan project. There are 8,000 acres of land involved and it was originally planned as a project to be reclaimed entirely through a gravity system by means of storage waters from what seemed to be ample watersheds. The Government, through the reclamation engineers, exercised all proper care in providing for the number of acres to be reclaimed. It made an examination covering a period of at least five years and found that the snowfall and the waterfall in the watersheds above the land was abundantly sufficient to furnish from 30,000 to upward of 50,000 acre-feet annually. That would mean, then, between 3 and 5 feet of water on every acre of the project. The project was carried through on this basis and succeeding years justified the action of the Government. The land was settled and the settlers put the land almost entirely into orchards, and to-day the 8,000 acres of land are covered with fruit trees. Three years ago the settlers were disappointed in a change of climatic conditions, and instead of from thirty to over fifty thousand acre-feet in the watershed the amount fell to approximately 8,000 to 10,000 acre-feet, and the year following only 14,000 acre-feet of water was available, or less than 2 acre-feet for each acre of land, and the following year, which is this year, 4,000 acre-feet of water, or, in other words, 6 inches of water for each acre under the project. Here had occurred a climatic change that no human being could foresee.

A most critical situation has arisen. The orchards are new. They are young. Unless water can be furnished to the tract now while the orchard is growing the trees will be stunted and the effect of not having water at this time will mean the same for them as insufficient nourishment means to a child. It simply stunts the growth, and the trees in the future years, no matter if water shall be furnished, will not be able to be the successfully bearing trees that they would be if the water can now be furnished. The land being in orchard presents an entirely different situation than if the land were in wheat or other annual crop. The amount of money asked for can be used in the latter part of this summer and next fall and next spring in the construction of a pumping plant to supplement the gravity-flow system that now exists. The department estimates that the amount will be ample. The water can be pumped from the Okanogan River, which flows right below the bench on which the tract of land is located.

More than that, the Director of the Reclamation Service advises me that the situation is absolutely critical, and regardless of what we may do with regard to others of the projects that have been the object of supplemental estimates, this project must be taken care of or great loss will occur.

I will say further that I have at least two projects in my own State that have been reported and recommended in the supplemental estimates. There are several others in the Western States of the same nature, but not one of them is on all fours with the project I have referred to. They are important, and as money shall come into the reclamation fund they should be taken care of. But, gentlemen, this project is critical. The others can be taken care of by supplemental appropriations later on this year from the receipt of moneys under the gas and oil leasing laws or other land laws, if the moneys shall be available. But for the immediate need it is most important and necessary that this amendment shall be carried through.

Again, it is necessary in order to protect the interests of the Government. The Government has one and one-quarter million dollars invested in the project. The settlers have twice as much, and both their interests must be protected.

Now, some one may say, "Why does not the project as a project hypothecate the values therein and borrow the money and put in a pumping plant?" The project can not do it, for the reason that it is a Government project, and the Government's claim covers the first lien on all the land under the project, and therefore no community moneys could be borrowed. Furthermore, the same reason that obtains to prevent the community or project from borrowing money prevents the individuals themselves from borrowing money to carry on this work that is so vitally necessary.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENCH. Yes.

Mr. LAYTON. Suppose the water supply fails next year and the year after and the year after that? Would they still ask Congress for help?

Mr. FRENCH. No. The relief furnished will be of permanent character. It will be an auxiliary system. The main system will be the gravity flow. This will be an auxiliary system to help out in case of need, and its cost will be paid for by the settlers the same as the original cost. [Applause.]

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming withdraws the point of order.

Mr. MONDELL. I think the appropriation should be made, but I regret the conditions which seem to make it necessary. I am not at all certain that what is now proposed to be done will permanently relieve the situation at Okanogan. A pumping plant such as is now proposed here, such as seems to be required, involves in addition to the large initial expenditure the expenditure of a large amount of money annually for operation and will lay a very heavy additional burden on these settlers. I do not know just who is responsible for the situation which seems to exist. Some one is, I fear, grievously at fault. Some one has committed a very great error of judgment in the computation of the water supply for this project, making it necessary to add the supplemental pumping system. But it seems at least we are told this must be done to save the investment which has been made, and the best we can do is to hope that the settlers may be able to pay out, and what is more, that they will realize the unusual action that is being taken in their behalf and be disposed to pay promptly. [Applause.]

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, in a statement that I made when the bill was presented I tried to make clear what the purpose of the committee was in regard to the supplemental estimate, aggregating $5,000,000 for reclamation projects. Since that time the Director of the Reclamation Service has written me a letter with regard to this one project. I read a portion of his letter regarding this item. He says:

It is of the utmost importance that this special estimate for the Okanogan project be allowed in full, as any shortage in this may be fatal to the bearing orchards and destroy the value of the property on which the security of the Government investment rests.

I dislike to see this amount of money appropriated in addition to that already carried. But Mr. Davis further makes it plain that there is no question but that this additional amount will be received by the reclamation fund out of the provisions of the oil-leasing bill. That being the case I do not want to take the responsibility of saying that we should not aid this project, which the director thinks is critical, and where he thinks the Government investment may be impaired or even lost, unless some provision is made to supply these orchards with water. I do not care for myself to take the responsibility of opposing the amendment. Both the director and those who are familiar with the project and the needs of the service there and have a peculiar knowledge with regard to it, are urgently requesting it.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. The committee had hearings upon this particular item, did they not?

Mr. GOOD. Yes. We had hearings upon all of them.

Mr. RAKER. What is the amount?

Mr. GOOD. The amount is $470,000.

Mr. RAKER. That is to put in a supplemental plant?

Mr. GOOD. To put in a pumping plant, to make good the shortage of the water for this project, consisting of about 8,000 acres of land, practically all in orchards.

Mr. RAKER. Do these people agree to pay the additional expense?

Mr. GOOD. Yes. It brings the total cost up, as I recall, to $150 an acre.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last seven words of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California is recognized.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, from the statement made by the chairman of the committee [Mr. GOOD] and the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH], of course, this project needs consideration. But we hope that this $470,000 additional will not be so much that the land owners will not be able to pay out, and that before the money is expended——

Mr. GOOD. The value of the crop is about $300 a year per acre.

Mr. RAKER. Then, in addition to that, it just shows the magnanimity of three or four of the other States that have not received any of this reclamation fund on the sales of public lands. We are just now putting into the reclamation fund a large sum of money by virtue of the oil-leasing bill, which comes back from royalties that are being paid to the Government. Of course, our people in California will feel a little bit curious to realize at the very moment when the money is placed in the reclamation fund, with so many thousand acres of land in California susceptible of irrigation, where the yield per acre is from three to five times as much as indicated on the land designated, that the funds should be transferred to another State. But successful development is what we want, and we wish to protect this project and see that it is carried out, with the view in mind that these proper projects in California, which State, if furnishing a large amount of this money, will afterwards be provided for.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment, without objection, will be withdrawn. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. WEBSTER].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last paragraph in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that there is nothing pending now before the committee. The last paragraph has been passed.

Mr. GOOD. What does the gentleman want?

Mr. BLANTON. I want just two minutes.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Texas may proceed for two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, we have just finished the last great supply measure, and, much to my surprise, we did not have the usual speech from the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] telling us just exactly how much money this Republican House had saved on this particular bill. The last time I figured it up, according to the gentleman's estimates, we had saved $1,800,000,000.

I only wish that we had numerous other supply measures to be acted upon at this session before we recess, because if we had, and if the gentleman could keep up the same ratio, he would probably have us out of debt before we recessed. [Laughter.] I do not know why he has not availed himself of the opportunity; but I want to say that next week the 19th of May will come around. It is usual on great anniversary occasions to have some kind of commemoration of the event, and when we get back into the House, either to-day or to-morrow, I am going to ask unanimous consent of the House that on the 19th of May I be permitted to proceed, say, five hours, in order to tell the country, in commemoration of the anniversary of the great Republican Party taking charge of this House, some of the great constructive (?) measures which have been passed (?) by the party in power.

Mr. GOOD. Does the gentleman think five hours would be sufficient?

Mr. BLANTON. I hardly think so. I think it would take a longer time than that.

Mr. STEVENSON. I think that in five minutes everything that this Republican majority has done could be told, with time to spare. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLANTON. I do not want the gentleman from South Carolina to interrupt my attempt at facetiousness.

On motion of Mr. GOOD, the committee rose; and Mr. MANN of Illinois having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. ANDERSON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the sundry civil appropriation bill, H. R. 13870, had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. GOOD. I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to the final passage.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Iowa moves the previous question on the bill and amendments to the final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a separate vote demanded on any of the amendments?

Mr. BLANTON. I ask for a separate vote on the two Newton amendments. I presume the vote could be taken on both at one time. They are similar amendments, and I ask unanimous consent that the vote may be taken on the two at one time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas asks for a separate vote on the two so-called Newton amendments. Is a separate vote demanded on any other amendment? If not, the Chair will put them en bloc.

The other amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now recurs upon the so-called Newton amendments; and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] asks unanimous consent that the vote be taken on both amendments together. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the Newton amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 18, line 3, strike out the figures "$2,357,000" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$2,569,000."

Page 18, line 17, strike out the figures "$1,905,000" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$2,023,125."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The question being taken, the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. BLANTON. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 71, noes 13.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum present. I do not like that 13 vote.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of no quorum present. Evidently there is no quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. Those in favor of agreeing to the amendments will, as their names are called, answer "yea," those opposed "nay."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 240, nays 38, answered "present" 2, not voting 147, as follows:

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED.

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

A bill (S. 4367) for the relief of Mrs. K. C. Higginbotham; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. TOWNSEND (for Mr. NEWBERRY):

A bill (S. 4371) granting a pension to William Bushey; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. BORAH:

A bill (S. 4372) to encourage the establishment of farms and suburban homes by veterans of the World War; to the Committee on Public Lands.

By Mr. JONES of Washington:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 195) to suspend the requirements of annual assessment work on mining claims in the Territory of Alaska during the year 1920; to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

DIVISION OF MINES AND GEOLOGY.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. President, I introduce a bill to create a division of mines and geology in the Department of the Interior, and ask that it be referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

I wish to call the attention of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] to this bill. The Senator from New Jersey recently introduced a bill to provide for the appointment of a Federal coal commission. The bill which I introduce proposes to create a division of mines and geology in the Department of the Interior and bring together all the governmental mining activities and place them under one head. I should like to have the Senator from New Jersey consider this measure in connection with his proposal for a Federal coal commission, with the idea of referring the powers and duties to be created under his bill to this division for the purpose of saving duplication of work.

The bill (S. 4369) to create a division of mines and geology in the Department of the Interior was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

AMENDMENTS TO SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MYERS submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $1,200 to compensate Benjamin O. Kerlee for injuries received while employed in the service of the Government as a workman in the Kaniksu National Forest in the State of Idaho during the year 1915, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CULBERSON submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $50,000 for an addition to the post-office building at Dallas, Tex., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MOSES submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 8078) to regulate the importation of coal-tar products, to promote the establishment of the manufacture thereof in the United States, and, as incident thereto, to amend the act of September 8, 1916, entitled "An act to increase the revenue, and for other purposes," which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on this day approved and signed the act (S. 2528) to grant certain lands to the city of Pocatello, State of Idaho, for conserving and protecting the source of its water supply.

TERMINATION OF WAR WITH GERMANY.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 327) terminating the state of war declared to exist April 6, 1917, between the Imperial German Government and the United States, permitting on conditions the resumption of reciprocal trade with Germany, and for other purposes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, the mountain has labored and brought forth a mouse. The resolution now before the Senate, as it has been reported from the committee with amendments, may not be stillborn, but it is certainly a very feeble product contrasted with that which we had been led to expect as a substitute for a peace treaty.

We have had great expectations. Six months ago the effort was initiated to bring into the Senate something which would produce peace, something which should constitute a settlement of the war through which we have passed, something which might take the place of the treaty of peace which we had rejected. Some of the resolutions presented here and elsewhere gave indications of strength and virility, at least. They attempted by holding out threats to Germany to compel that country to accord to us the benefits, or some of them, provided in the peace treaty. They were mandatory in their character. They threatened Germany with a commercial war and with other evils if Germany failed to accord to us the protection of our interests, which are now utterly unprotected in the absence of treaty reservations.

I want to-day to follow somewhat the zigzag course of these sundry resolutions, which have at last wound up here in the Senate with the impotent conclusion reached by this substitute resolution framed by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] and reported by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE].

First of all, there came last November after the vote on the treaty a resolution presented by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. It was very brief and to the point. It declared the war between the United States and Germany at an end. For some reason the Senator from Massachusetts deserted his child after he had brought it to the Senate doorstep. No action was taken upon it either in the committee of which he is chairman or in the Senate in which he is leader on the Republican side.

Then there came the second attempt, made by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX]. His resolution resolved "that peace exists between the United States and Germany."

The fine distinction there is between a declaration that the war is at an end and the declaration that peace exists between the United States and Germany I shall not undertake to discuss, but in that respect the resolution presented by the Senator from Pennsylvania differed from the resolution presented by the Senator from Massachusetts. There was one respect, however, in which the Senators agreed, and that was to abandon their resolutions, for the Senator from Pennsylvania followed the example of the Senator from Massachusetts, and abandoned his resolution.

On December 16 the third effort was made toward a so-called peace resolution. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to which the other resolution had been referred, a resolution which made an entirely fresh start in the great work of securing peace by an unconstitutional method. It made no effort to revive either the Knox or the Lodge plan as its leading proposition, but made, as I have said, an entirely fresh start. It proposed to repeal the declaration of war passed by Congress in April, 1917, and provided that unless Germany should give us the benefits of the treaty that we had rejected, the President might prohibit commercial intercourse with that nation. What did that proposition involve? It involved a war of another sort; it involved a destructive commercial contest; it involved cutting ourselves off from all benefit of trade with Germany and leaving the rest of the world to enjoy all of the benefits that we lost.

That proposition, however, had the support of both the Knox and the Lodge forces upon the committee. It was reported out and placed upon the calendar last December, and there it has rested as completely abandoned as were the other attempts which never emerged from the committee. I think it was abandoned because it aroused no public enthusiasm in the United States. The people pretty thoroughly realized that there were serious difficulties in the way of reaching a peace settlement by that method. They realized, in the first place, that it was impossible without the cooperation of the President of the United States, with whom these statesmen seriously objected to cooperating; they realized that if the President should take such a course, and should declare an embargo, it would bring upon the United States one of the greatest disasters imaginable.

Nevertheless something had to be done. Intransigent statesmen, who had been absolutely unwilling to yield a jot or a tittle in the consideration of the peace treaty toward reaching a compromise, realized that there was upon them a growing responsibility to do something, and so the fourth attempt was undertaken.

Conferences began between certain Senators and certain Members of the House of Representatives. It was proposed to abandon the old tradition that the Senate, with the President, had control over foreign affairs, to the exclusion of the House of Representatives, and in the distress of the moment to take the House of Representatives into partnership with the Senate in an effort to do an unconstitutional thing in reaching a peace settlement. Conferences were held between Senators and Members of the House of Representatives, and the fourth attempt took form in the shape of a joint resolution differing in some respects from any that had been theretofore proposed, but combining also some of their features.

The very Senators who here have denounced parts of the treaty of Versailles as a violation of our Constitution entered into a deliberate attempt, in partnership with the House of Representatives, to secure in an unconstitutional way a peace settlement which can only come as the result of a treaty duly negotiated and ratified. They forgot, apparently, that the question of giving to the Congress of the United States the power to declare peace was specifically withheld in the Constitutional Convention of 1787; they forgot, apparently, that after the Constitutional Convention had decided to vest in the Congress the power to declare war and when the argument was made that the same body which declared war should also have the power to declare peace when that proposition came to a vote in the convention every State represented voted "no," including the State of Pennsylvania, represented here by Senator KNOX, and the State of Massachusetts, represented by Senator LODGE. Every State, in the framing of the Constitution, withheld from Congress, which has the power to declare war, the power to declare peace, the argument being obvious that the declaration of war was an overt, simple act, which the Congress, representing the people, could perform, whereas the negotiation of a peace treaty and the making of a peace settlement was something which, in the very nature of things, the great legislative body, composed of two houses, could not do. So it was deliberately and specifically denied to Congress that it should have the power to make peace; and yet these constitutional devotees, these men who are afraid to take a step toward doing away with war, for fear it may infringe some possible construction of the Constitution, deliberately enter into a movement to defy the Constitution and to enter a peace settlement in an unconstitutional way.

For 130 years the United States has recognized that there is only one way to make peace; for 130 years every peace settlement has been made by treaty, and every writer has recognized that peace settlements could not be made in any way except by a treaty negotiated by the President with the consent of the Senate.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator recognizes, does he not, that the termination of the Civil War was declared by act of Congress, and it is only the act of Congress that the Supreme Court has recognized as definitely fixing the date of the termination of the Civil War?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Certainly; but I am not talking about domestic concerns, and the Civil War was a domestic concern.

Mr. LENROOT. But it was a war.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It was an insurrection.

Mr. LENROOT. It was a war, and was so recognized.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It was a domestic concern. I am talking about wars with foreign countries that require negotiations to bring about a settlement.

Mr. LENROOT. If the Senator will yield further, the constitutional provision to which the Senator refers does not differentiate between a war with a foreign country and a domestic war; and they were both wars.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. If the Senator wants to take the position that domestic violence can only be settled as a foreign war is settled, he is correct; but it is manifest that the foreign affairs of the United States are placed in the sole and only control of the Executive. The Constitution specifically places in him the sole power to negotiate treaties and settle foreign affairs, and the only restriction upon him is that in making treaties he must have the consent of two-thirds of the Senators present and voting. I do not care to discuss the constitutional question; I only mention this phase of the matter, because these Senators have been sticklers for strict constitutional construction; and there can not be any question after what we know of the discussions of the Constitutional Convention that the States when they formed the Union deliberately withheld from Congress the power to make a peace settlement. No question of this kind has been raised for 130 years. The Senate has gloried in its exclusive right, with the President, to control the foreign affairs of the country.

The House resolution, framed after negotiations and conferences between Senators and Members of the House, provided in brief for a recognition of the theory presented by the Senator from Massachusetts; it avoided the Knox theory of declaring peace, and adopted the Lodge theory of declaring the war at an end. Then it repealed the war powers of the President.

It further provided that unless Germany within 45 days, by some proper legislative or administrative action, should waive all demands against the United States, except such as she would be entitled to under the rejected peace treaty, the President might or should declare a commercial war; it gave him the privilege of declaring it, and made it his duty to do so. Then, it went further and specifically reserved our rights under the armistice of November, 1918, and declared that we did not waive the fines, penalties, and forfeitures which had been exacted during the war, and that we specifically ratified and retained them. This was evidently an effort at compulsion; it was an effort to compel Germany to grant us a peace settlement that would protect the rights which were protected under the peace treaty which we had rejected.

The resolution passed the House and came to the Senate, where it was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. The Committee on Foreign Relations struck out everything except the enacting clause and substituted an entirely new resolution prepared by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX].

This joint resolution is mild and weak compared with the House joint resolution. It diminishes down to the point where we can say that "the mountain has labored and brought forth a mouse." There is no attempt to declare peace. Evidently the statesman-lawyer from Pennsylvania has concluded that as the Constitutional Convention specifically withheld from the Congress the power to declare peace, that attempt should be avoided; but there is a declaration that the war is at an end, and I leave the lawyers of the Senate to distinguish between the two. Evidently there is a distinction made by these various efforts to bring about peace. We apparently are confronted with the proposition that while the Congress has no power to declare peace, it may have power to declare the war at an end.

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], in his speech here the other day, labored long and industriously to establish one proposition, and he cited numerous well-known authorities to prove that peace may come by a cessation—as he called it, the silent cessation—of hostilities. He cited, among the older authorities, the attitude of Secretary Seward in the sixties, when he insisted in his diplomatic correspondence that the war in South America had come to an end by the cessation of hostilities; and the Senator from Pennsylvania declared that that position of Secretary Seward had put the United States in the attitude of recognizing that war could come to an end by the mere cessation of hostilities, and he accepted that as the established policy of the United States. He says "our country was committed to that principle." Well, now, if we are committed to that principle, why this joint resolution? Hostilities ceased in November of 1918. If there is no war now, why attempt to bring it to an end by a joint resolution? How can we terminate a war that does not exist?

Our Army, after that settlement, was demobilized and reduced to a peace basis. All of our actions indicate that so far as the United States is concerned we are slowly resuming with Germany a condition inconsistent with war. Since January, 1919—a little over a year—we have sold to Germany hundreds of millions of dollars of goods, and purchased from her a smaller amount; and yet we are told that this joint resolution is necessary to open commercial relations and to end the war which was terminated when the hostilities terminated by the armistice of 1918.

The real trouble is that the Senator from Pennsylvania is engaged in an effort to make a peace settlement and not to end the war. He has been compelled to abandon the threat of commercial war with Germany, because the people of the United States would not tolerate any such disaster to the country. He has been compelled to abandon the attempt even to request the President to inaugurate a commercial war to carry this joint resolution into effect, and his joint resolution has diminished down to the point where it does little more than to declare the war at an end and to repeal the joint resolutions by which war was declared.

One thing he holds out as a threat to Germany in this joint resolution reported from the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations to compel Germany to give us the benefit of the treaty we rejected, and that one thing is this: He declares in his joint resolution that unless Germany gives us those concessions which were provided for in the treaty, we will continue to hold the German property in this country. Well, of what value is that? We are continuing to hold that property now. There is nothing new and nothing further in the threat that we are going to continue to do it. Moreover, we have a stronger hold on that property now than we would have if this peace resolution should go into effect. We are holding it now under our war powers. After we have repealed our declaration of war, and officially declared here that the war is at an end, German nationals might claim rights in our courts; and our hold upon the German property is about as feeble a threat, as mild a compulsion, as can be conceived.

Again I say, "the mountain has labored and brought forth a mouse."

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield.

Mr. KELLOGG. Did I understand the Senator to say that commerce was going on between this country and Germany? Is it not a fact that under the trading with the enemy act all such commerce, except as permitted by the President, is prohibited?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I have secured from the Department of Commerce a statement of our exports to Germany and our imports from Germany since January, 1919. I am not able to give the exact figures now, but my recollection is that up to the 1st of April our exports to Germany, during that period, were over $145,000,000. I have not investigated as to how this is done, but I imagine it is done under the terms of the treaty itself, which permit the resumption of commerce when Germany and three of the main parties to the controversy have signed the treaty.

Mr. KELLOGG. That treaty does not apply to the United States until it is ratified by the Senate, and that does not authorize an American national to deal with German nationals; does it?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think if the Senator examines the last paragraph in the treaty he will find that commerce is resumed between all the belligerants and Germany, when the treaty goes into effect as to the first three nations.

Mr. KELLOGG. Who made such a treaty for the United States?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am not disputing the Senator. The fact is that we have the commerce, and I am only giving him my assumption as to how we got it. If we have it, that is sufficient, and it is not very important to know how we got it. I am giving the Senator my theory of the case. We, as a Nation, can get no benefits as a war settlement from a treaty until we ratify it; but if the treaty provides that the commerce of Germany is open to the world after three nations at war with Germany have signed it, I suppose, like any other nation, under the armistice we could take advantage of it.

Now, Mr. President, I want to say a few words concerning the argument presented by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], and then I shall be through.

He states that—

> The welfare and safety of the Nation imperatively demand that we know we have peace.

Well, I suppose if that is true now, it was true during all the long, weary months when we tried to get a ratification of the treaty, and I am not able to understand now why Senators have become so anxious for peace when they were so indifferent to the great opportunity that was presented a short time ago to secure it in the legitimate way.

Again, the Senator from Pennsylvania says in rather alarming tones:

> The whole world seethes with revolution.

Does the Senator from Pennsylvania think that his little four-by-nine resolution is going to put a stop to the "seething of revolution" throughout the world.

Again, he says:

> Our own Nation is in ferment and turmoil. Force and strife are rampant and threaten the destruction not only of our property but of our free institutions and even of our very lives.

I am afraid the Senator from Pennsylvania must have been consulting a ouija board to have discovered any such condition as that, and I am very sure that, even if it were true, the adoption of this impotent resolution would not cure it.

Again, the Senator from Pennsylvania says:

> And yet we stand and have stood for months as a rudderless ship foundering in the trough of tremendous seas.

My nautical knowledge is limited, but I do not know how a rudderless ship can stand either in the trough of the sea or anywhere else, and I am very sure that no relief can come to such a ship by a little joint resolution of this sort.

He further says:

> We must not dare longer to delay a return to the ordered government of peace.

Why not? He chose, with others, that alternative. We presented here an opportunity for a full and complete settlement and a timely settlement. He and his associates were the ones that dared to delay, not we. And what stop could be put to such a delay by the enactment of a little joint resolution like this, that would be utterly disregarded by Germany?

Further, he says:

> We must not hazard a further postponement in turning our undivided deliberations to our home problems.

Oh, that is splendid! Congress has been in session for a year, and the Senator from Pennsylvania declares that we must not hazard a further delay or postponement in turning our undivided deliberations to our home problems. Why does he not do it? This has not anything to do with home problems. Why has the Congress neglected the home problems for the past year? It has been in session; its power has been complete; committees have been organized. Why have not the home problems been attacked if they exist?

Again, he says:

> As a preliminary step, the Executive must be returned to his peace-time powers and prerogatives.

It does not require the adoption of a resolution of this sort to return the Executive to his peace-time powers and prerogatives. This resolution would not do it, except in the clause by which it repeals the war-time powers. I believe the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] has introduced a bill to repeal those war-time powers. If there is virtue in that proposition, it can be attacked in a separate way. It does not take a resolution attempting to compel a peace settlement in violation of the Constitution to repeal the war-time powers of the President of the United States.

Again, he says:

> The resolution before us is designed to bring us to this.

Just think! This resolution is designed to put a stop to the seething of revolution throughout the world; it is designed to put a stop to the ferment and turmoil throughout the United States which threatens our lives and our property, and all these other evils pictured by the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Then, the Senator from Pensylvania uses this language:

> The course of the President * * * leaves no chance for doubt that he will continue, hereafter as heretofore, to thwart, so far as he is able, every attempt on the part of the Senate, the Congress, or the people, to take any action immediately or remotely affecting in however slight a degree, through change or modification, the provisions of the treaty of Versailles as it came to us fresh from his signature.

That really is delicious, Mr. President, that the President of the United States, who for something like six months has been a bedridden invalid, much of that time in danger of his very life, has been devoting himself to thwarting the Senate and the Congress and the people in an effort to bring about peace. The fact is that the President of the United States, in the exercise of his constitutional power, his exclusive and sole constitutional power, negotiated a treaty; he brought it to the Senate; he asked for the consent of the Senate to its ratification; and the Senate failed to give that consent and sent it back to the White House. Who is thwarting, who is hindering, who is delaying, under those circumstances? The Senate did not give its consent. The Senate did not function, and it did not function because there was a deliberate refusal to compromise differences, as there might have been a compromise. Yet we are told that this unfortunate invalid in the White House, hardly able to do the necessary things which he must do as an Executive, has been spending his time thwarting the people, thwarting the Congress, in trying to secure peace. Why did not the Senate give its consent to ratify the treaty?

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. If the President had not written the letters which he did to the Senator from Nebraska and others, and had not used his influence upon Democratic Senators, does not the Senator know that the treaty would have been ratified with these reservations?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. No; I do not.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield.

Mr. KELLOGG. I should like to ask the Senator how much compromise there was in the President's letter the other day to the national committeeman in Oregon?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The President's letter in that case declared his devotion to the League of Nations and denounced the Lodge reservations. That is all it did. I denounce them. I will never consent to them, and many other Senators never would, and millions of people never would. But those Lodge reservations were matched by reservations on this side of the aisle. I had the honor to offer five reservations, and they were indorsed by the President, and they were a tender of compromise. On article 10 I offered a reservation which was a compromise. There was some doubt as to whether the President would accept it, but we on this side of the aisle were willing to stand for it. You did not accept it. It was drawn by a former Republican President of the United States, and yet you refused to accept it. We offered all the compromise; you offered none. You refused all.

Again the Senator from Pennsylvania says:

He—

That is, the President—

has preferred to keep the country in an alleged state of war for now almost a year rather than abate one jot or tittle of the full measure his isolated will had set for the Nation.

Mr. President, how can a man say a thing of that sort to the Senate of the United States with a straight face? To keep the country in an alleged state of war for a year! The President came back here with the treaty and delivered it to the Senate in July, 1919, and the Senate sent it to the Committee on Foreign Relations, of which the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] is a member. That committee locked up that treaty within the four walls of its committee room for two months, although they might just as well have reported it out in one week. They kept it for two months, locked up there, delaying peace.

The Senator from Pennsylvania was one of the Senators whose votes made that outrageous delay possible, and when it came into the Senate, by a report of the committee, on the 10th of September, as I recall it, it was debated up to the 15th of November. Yes; it had been debated before September. We had been debating it here all through May, June, July, and August, and then September, October, and until the 15th of November, and when finally patience ceased to be a virtue, and I offered a resolution of cloture to stop debate, the Senator from Pennsylvania voted against it. He did not want to stop debate. He was not then afraid of delay. Not only that, but when my resolution was beaten and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] offered another resolution of cloture, which was generally supported throughout the Senate, the Senator from Pennsylvania, who now talks about delay, voted even then against putting an end to debate and bringing action to the fore. He voted against ratifying the treaty in any form. Yet he talks about the President of the United States keeping the country in a state of war, when he was instrumental himself in continuing that perfectly outrageous delay, and if he had had his way we would have been debating the question even to this very day.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I should like to inquire of the Senator if the debate did not begin even earlier than he has stated? Did it not begin in December, 1918, and run all through the early months of 1919, before the treaty itself was actually presented to the Senate?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator is entirely correct.

Mr. BORAH. The debate really began in January, 1917, on the question of a league of nations. It has been going on ever since that time and it will continue for some time yet.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, will it interrupt the Senator if I call his attention to two Supreme Court decisions regarding the termination of rebellion or civil war between the States?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I will be very glad to have the Senator do it.

Mr. THOMAS. The inquiry of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] a few minutes ago, directed to the Senator from Nebraska, was to the effect that Congress had by resolution declared a state of peace, or enacted a state of peace, between the States of the Union theretofore engaged in civil war. I was very much aroused by the inquiry, because it seemed to conflict with my recollection of the facts. Upon a very hasty examination of the question since then I have discovered that my memory was not at fault, and in order to set the question at rest I would like to call the attention of the Senate to the case of United States against Anderson, reported in Ninth Wallace, on page 56, in which the Supreme Court says:

As respects rights intended to be secured by the above-mentioned abandoned or captured property act, "the suppression of the rebellion" is to be regarded as having taken place on the 20th of August, 1866, on which day the President by proclamation declared it suppressed in Texas "and throughout the whole of the United States of America," that same date being apparently adopted by Congress in a statute continuing a certain rate of pay to soldiers in the Army "for three years after the close of the rebellion, as announced by the President of the United States by proclamation bearing date August 20, 1866." (U. S. Repts., 9 Wall., p. 56.)

A few years subsequently, in the case of McElrath v. United States (102 U. S. Repts.), the same question presented itself, and Justice Harlan, on page 438 of the volume, asks the question in his opinion:

But when was the rebellion suppressed and peace inaugurated? Not until the 20th day of August, 1866, on which day the President announced, by proclamation, that the insurrection against the national authority was at an end, and that "peace, order, tranquillity, and civil authority" then existed "in and throughout the whole of the United States of America." (14 Stat., 814; United States v. Anderson, 9 Wall., 71; the Protector, 12 id., 702.) The effect of that proclamation, as fixing the time when the rebellion closed, was distinctly recognized by Congress in the act of March 2, 1867. (102 U. S. Repts., Otto 12, p. 438.)

A subsequent enactment, if you please. So I think it is fair to say that the official close of the rebellion was the proclamation of the President of August 20, 1866, and the resolution of Congress upon the subject merely recognized and confirmed that date.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I thank the Senator from Colorado for his interruption, and I recall now noticing heretofore that the President did issue a proclamation to that effect.

Mr. KELLOGG. Will the Senator permit me to ask a question of the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield.

Mr. KELLOGG. I should like to ask the Senator from Colorado if he thinks, in a foreign war, the President has any power by proclamation to declare peace, concluding the terms of peace?

Mr. THOMAS. No, Mr. President; I do not say that. My only purpose was to call the attention of the Senate to the two decisions, of which I had some general recollection, and which confirmed that recollection, whereby the President, by proclamation of August 20, 1866, did declare a state of peace, which had been used as the official termination of the war. The only resolutions of Congress upon the subject postdated the proclamation of the President and merely recognized it as official.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator from Colorado yield?

Mr. THOMAS. I have not the floor.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. If very brief, I will yield. I am about through.

Mr. LENROOT. In each of those cases—and there is a third case, with which the Senator may be familiar—the Senator realizes that the action was predicated upon Congress ratifying the act of the President.

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; but the ratification succeeded——

Mr. LENROOT. Oh, certainly.

Mr. THOMAS. The ratification succeeded the proclamation of the President, and referred to it incidentally, the subject matter of the resolutions being entirely different from the fixing of the date when peace was declared and officially announced as between the warring States.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I have about finished. In conclusion I wish to read another statement made by the Senator from Pennsylvania, although before I leave this I ought to make some comment upon the statement by the Senator from Pennsylvania in this paragraph which I have just read denouncing the President's "isolated will." I think it is the Senate of the United States that is isolated—not the President.

The President entered into a treaty with all the nations engaged in the war. He agreed with them. This treaty has now been ratified by the nations that participated in the war, with the exception of the United States. But, to show that the President is not isolated, let me show what the real facts are about the League of Nations.

Fifteen States are now members of the league, having signed and ratified the treaty of Versailles. Thirteen additional States, neutral in the war, having been invited to join the league, have now done so.

Now, who is isolated? Is it the President of the United States, who entered into this great international compact to preserve the peace of the world, already ratified by almost every nation on earth that is permitted to join it, or is it the Senate of the United States, which has refused ratification of that great treaty?

But I must conclude. The Senator from Pennsylvania finally said:

He—

Referring to the President—has conjured up every power within the whole vast executive domain in his efforts to compel this Senate to surrender its will and judgment to him, to become mere automatons to register his mandate, to approve this treaty in its last minutiæ of detail as he sent it to us.

Why, Mr. President, is there then no great issue involved in this difference in the Senate? Is it a mere little detail, as the Senator from Pennsylvania indicates? On the contrary, it is a great issue.

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], and others have demanded that the United States shall not pledge itself to maintain the political independence and territorial integrity of the nations in the league. They object to that pledge. The President of the United States wants it kept as it was written. That does not present an insignificant detail. It presents a great issue, and the Senator from Pennsylvania must know it. That is an issue that is going before the people of the United States in this election, and to charge that the President is indulging in trifles and insignificant differences with the Senate is to indict his own associates who have clung tenaciously to the claim that the United States should not make that pledge.

Mr. President, we entered into the war and associated ourselves with certain nations. We were practically under a pledge to remain with those nations until a peace was concluded and we were a party to it. Now it is proposed to desert, now it is proposed by these various peace and end-the-war resolutions to make a separate deal with Germany, to compel Germany to make a separate deal with us. How does that comport with the utterances and the pledges of Senators so few months ago?

In the Forum Magazine for December, 1918, the Senator from Massachusetts made this statement:

> The President, who delivered the war message, and Congress, who voted for war, would be guilty of the blackest crime if they were willing to make a peace on the status quo ante bellum and re-create the situation which existed before the war. If we send our armies and our young men abroad to be killed and wounded in northern France and Flanders with no result but this, our entrance into war with such an intention was a crime which nothing can justify. The intent of Congress and the intent of the President was that there could be no peace until we could create a situation where no such war as this could recur. We can not make peace in the ordinary way. We can not, in the first place, make peace except in company with our allies. It would brand us with everlasting dishonor and bring ruin to us also if we undertook to make a separate peace.

And now the same Senators are willing to violate the Constitution, to induce the House of Representatives to usurp powers that do not belong to it, in order that they may make a separate peace with Germany, which they so recently unmeasuredly denounced.

Mr. President, we all know that this is a waste of time, a complete waste of time. If by any chance, which I hope may not occur, this resolution should pass and the conferees should agree upon some settlement of differences between the House and the Senate, we all know that the resolution will be vetoed. Those who proposed the resolution know it; they know that while the people may be asking for peace this will not bring peace. The people have asked for bread and it is proposed to give them a stone. Even if the President should approve it, Germany would not accept it. The people ask for bread and you propose to give them a stone. We are wasting our time. Senators may vote for this resolution; some may vote for it not believing in it. I can hardly think that it will pass the Senate, but if it does we know it will be a waste of time, because it can never be approved by the President nor passed over his veto.

VALUE OF COTTON CONTRACTS.

Mr. COMER. Mr. President, cotton is bought or sold on the exchanges for two distinct purposes, with distinct sets of interests. The producer, the dealer, the manufacturer, buy as a hedge to insure the safe conduct of their business; the gambling interests operate on the exchanges for the purpose of making money out of the variations in price. The more stabilized the price, the nearer it conforms to spot middling, the greater the benefit to the business class; the less stabilized the price, the more it can be factitiously changed, the greater the interest of the gambler.

The producer and the manufacturer are the only ones that give value; the dealer is a convenience, the gamblers add nothing of value, do not increase the supply a bale, do not decrease the supply a bale, and can only be useful in giving an index as to what the value is and will be. If this knowledge comes from correct data and skilled prognostics, from natural and demand conditions, correctly judging same, then it is useful; when it comes from any false, factitious combinations, exercising an unnatural influence, an ephemeral influence, then it is bad.

Beyond an index value, the exchange creates no value, adds no value, and when it does not truly index value, when the prices are manipulated, then the farmer, dealer, and manufacturer are the sufferers. The spinner is the one consumer of cotton. It is his purchases which make the demand; the farmer is the one producer of cotton, it is his production which makes the supply. These two great interests meet on the broad field of supply and demand, and if you will add to this consumption, then you have absolutely the only interest which can add or take away value; and if within the law any business assumes to accomplish value, making a fiat price, that business becomes dangerous to the best interests of everything connected with legitimate cotton handling. Whenever anything attempts to make or assumes to make a fiat price, I do not care what it is, it is dangerous.

Operations on the exchanges act as a medium indexing price and guaranteeing transactions. In New York the charge is $20 per hundred bales, and a contract is insured by deposit of $10 to $20 a bale. The New Orleans charge for handling a contract of 100 bales is $15, and they, too, require a deposit of $10 to $20 a bale. This is legitimate and increases or decreases according to changes in price.

If the claims made by the exchanges that they would have an influence increasing the value of low-grade cotton were true, if by law we were to attempt to give them the power to increase the price of low-grade cotton, then they would have the power, which we would accentuate by law, to make a value, and if they could make a value, then they could increase it or decrease it at will, because the power to create carries the power to change.

The Sherman antitrust law, which the Government has invoked so many times to prevent the joining together of great factors in commerce for the purpose of at pleasure making a price, increase it up or down, was enacted and is used to prevent this very thing.

The exchanges' constant assertion that the power to tender low grades through the exchanges increases the value of these low grades and brings them into enforced use, and their constant method of dangling this lure before the eyes of the low-grade holders and their representatives, exactly as a phantom minnow is trolled, is an admission of the power and ability to manipulate the market in disregard of a value fixed by supply and demand, and the energy with which they prosecute this idea evidences their ultimate desire to retain the control now in their hands for a selfish advantage. The argument is absolutely false and is the camouflage with which they are concealing the devices for ambuscading the unwary.

The history of the cotton exchanges shows that the more low grades which they can tender on the exchanges the more usable becomes the multiplex of off-grade cotton, with which they can manipulate and destroy the stability of any contract. The exchanges all admit that if the proposed amendment is passed the price of a contract will advance, and this is true. It will advance and should advance to a parity of spot-cotton value, and to the very extent that the new delivery of one-half middling and above will assimilate to the value of spot cotton to that extent will the contract be stabilized commensurate with the price of the supply and demand of cotton. They claim that the proposed amendment will hurt cotton as a banking proposition; in other words, injure the credit of it. On the contrary, to the very extent that it increases the stability of the contract to the spot market to that very extent will it increase its value as a banking asset. To the full extent that the readers of the market—those most interested in it—can day by day take up the contract quotations—a contract quotation which is stabilized with the market and is not subject to the various vicissitudes of the conditions made by a factitious market—to that very extent will cotton as collateral be more desirable. Any business man prefers a supply and demand price back of his collateral rather than a factitious price by a coterie of people.

Summing this up, if the exchanges had their claimed power to make a value to low grades or any grade ulterior to the supply-and-demand price, then immediately this would become one of the most dangerous influences in the cotton business. If they can increase it to a higher price, they can decrease it to a lower price in spite of the economic law, and in every age this has been regarded as one of the greatest dangers that follows from a combination of capital.

The exchanges have by unbusinesslike processes accumulating within the law combinations of types of cotton and at unnatural prices as fictitiously made prices been used to fictitiously depress cotton values, thus interfering with the regular course of honest business and making difficult and dangerous the accomplishment by business men of the very usufruct for which the exchanges were designed.

Again assuring every Member of Congress that by every rule of business, by every law of political economy, that all the statements of the exchanges that the proposed amendment stabilizing values will hurt the producer, the dealer, and the manufacturer, and all the statements that this amendment will prejudiciously work to the spinner's interest, against the producer and dealer, are absolutely without fact and are used as a camouflage to screen their determination to maintain the gamblers' province in our cotton-futures law.

One of my colleagues in the Senate wrote me a letter and inclosed a letter, to which he requested me to reply. The letter which was sent to the Senator and by him forwarded to me is as follows:

MY DEAR SENATOR: I want you to read carefully this letter and note the comments on the Comer amendment. It seems to me that they have discriminated against low-grade cotton already to almost ruin the farmer who has low grade. Prior to the war strict low-middling cotton was only 50 to 100 points below middling cotton, now it is 300 to 350 points below middling cotton. Low-middling cotton was only 200 points off, and now it is 750 points off. The actual commercial difference in manufacturing cotton is 100 off for strict low and 250 off for low middling. It looks like they are doing all they can to take the farmers' cotton as low as possible, regardless of what the mill man makes. Please look into this amendment.

In reply I sent the Senator the following letter:

MY DEAR SENATOR: Yours of the 8th, with inclosure from ———, asking me to reply to same, received. Thank you very much, but the discussions that I have made on this subject, March 25, 30, April 1, 3, 17, 29, and May 8, if carefully read, answer every statement by Messrs. Bache & Co.

They are exchange members who sent him a circular.

I would be glad that you carefully read same, as this question, whether the amendment carries now or not, will be of urgency until the exchange quotations will reliably conform to spot cotton quotations, and it will be impossible for any coterie of would-be speculators to use the exchanges to make a fiat market.

Unquestionably, you remember the silver and gold discussions, when it was seriously urged by a great many smart people that gold was not a commodity, was not subject to the law of supply and demand, and its value did not oscillate with the use and market for same, that it was like a yardstick, remaining one length, one measure under any and all circumstances. You will remember the attempt the Government made to stamp a fiat value on silver. Time has demonstrated that no commodity has an unwavering value; that it is subject to all the laws of supply and demand; that even as strong as the unified government of the largest nations of the world they could not establish a fixed, unvarying value of gold. How much less is this preposterous assertion by the exchange propagandist that the exchanges impart a fiat value to cotton and that the usufruct of certain grades in the exchanges imparts value.

The New York Exchange price on 10 different grades by the Smith-Lever bill is secured and furnished by the Bureau of Markets in the Agricultural Department, and this is secured by getting daily from 10 spot markets (Norfolk, Va., Augusta, Ga., Savannah, Ga., Montgomery, Ala., New Orleans, La., Memphis, Tenn., Little Rock, Ark., Dallas, Houston, and Galveston, Tex.) quotations from spot sales on 10 different grades and the compositeness of these 10 grades, which makes the basis middling, and on this basis the futures contract price, furnished by the Bureau of Markets, makes the differentials in the different grades. In other words, under the law the Bureau of Markets gets from the actual spot sales of the 10 spot markets the price of cotton and furnishes it to the exchanges. The exchanges do not make value.

There is a difference between the New York and the New Orleans exchanges, for New Orleans gets its exchange price from the spot sales of the day; that is the arrangement.

The exchanges get the values on the different grades from the actual sales of 10 spot markets—the very places and, possibly, at the very prices to which the spinner goes to buy this cotton.

Mr. ——— submits, as to the ground of his complaint, that low-grade cotton has been very much discriminated against, and mentions the difference in price now and before the war of strict low middling and low middling as compared to middling. Mr. ——— overlooked the fact that both of these grades—strict low middling and low middling—are tenderable by the exchanges under the law.

I am inclosing you differentials made by the New Orleans exchanges on 210 bales which were tendered us on a 200-bale May contract, and which was received at these differences and shipped out. Will call particular attention that the basis middling was 39.67, i. e., the exchange middling; the real middling was at least 41 cents. There were 199 bales of low middling delivered on this at 850 points off middling basis at New Orleans, or at a price of 31.17. I am sure Mr. ——— could get at least that much or more for low middling cotton anywhere within the cotton belt. This is a copy of an actual delivery to the Avondale Mills last week.

The exchanges—I mean the exchange members, the speculators—want all the low grades possible to remain tenderable on a contract; not that it is possible to add 1 cent to the value of low grades, but by the use and assembly of low grades that they can depress the market. This has been the exchange history for years, and the very thing we have been fighting.

The exchanges have tried to impress upon the Members of Congress that cotton is delivered through the exchanges. This is far from a fact; it is not intended that a bale should be delivered through the exchanges. The exchanges are supposed simply to index the value of spot cotton; and a contract on the exchange is bought not for delivery but as a hedge. There has been less than 10,000 bales passed through the New York exchange this year, yet there have been millions of bales sold; there have been less than 25,000 bales passed through the New Orleans exchange. Our company has bought and sold on the New Orleans exchange more than 25,000 bales, out of which we have only taken this 210 bales delivered, and that was largely an accident.

The exchanges never propose to add any value to the price of cotton until at a time when some restrictive legislation against the power to gamble and depress cotton on the exchanges is before Congress, at which time they become great friends to the farmer and to the price of cotton.

With regards and best wishes.

Yours, very truly, ——— ———.

MAY 10, 1920.

I read now a copy of the letter I wrote to the gentleman, whose letter was forwarded to me:

MY DEAR SIR: As requested by Senator ———, I am answering your recent letter to him regarding my proposed amendment to the cotton-futures act, and for your consideration I am inclosing copy of my speech before the Senate under date of April 17 on the subject.

Will call your attention to the following statement to impress upon you the fallacy of cotton exchanges protecting low grades: If the exchanges can furnish a medium by which the owners of low-grade cotton can sell and deliver their low grades, who is the man that is going to take this cotton through the exchanges? Nobody has cotton delivered to them on the exchanges except they take it willingly and nobody is going to take cotton willingly unless they have a place where they can put it. In other words, unless there is a commercial demand for it, unless there is a spinner who will take it, he would much prefer having it direct from the dealer and free from the exchange delivery costs.

If the owners of low-grade cotton should attempt to force deliveries through the exchanges all they would do would be to depress the value of contracts down to the point where the buyer would prefer to take the cotton rather than to take his loss in money, and when it reaches that point the owners of low-grade cotton would not have to deliver it through the exchanges, because that would be the price that the owner could get in the commercial markets.

This is abundantly borne out by the fact that for years past all that the dealers on the exchanges have used the low grades for is to assemble it in such a multiplex manner that few spinners could use it and they had to put the price of cotton down, making of the exchanges not a market of value to the owners of low grades, or any grade, but being of such an assembly that the market is forced down by the tender, and this is where they make their money. The exchanges are making this low-grade fight, as I have said, to camouflage, to keep the power to gamble the market.

With regards,

Yours, very truly, ——— ———.

MAY 10, 1920.

I have here the circular of J. S. Bache & Co., members of the New York Stock Exchange, and, like Mr. Thompson, mighty good folks. They are sending out this circular broadcast; they quote from the Wall Street Journal:

COMER AMENDMENT DISREGARDS PRODUCERS' INTERESTS, OPERATORS SAY.

And it was this circular that they sent to this gentleman here mentioned that brought out the letter to the Senator from one of the Southern States. He writes:

Now, remember that Mr. COMER is a big man in his way; has achieved large things. I have known him for many years. He is a man who has won his way to great financial success as a mill owner, who has been president of the Alabama railroad commission, and fought the railroads and other great corporations when one ordinarily would expect him to be their supporter.

That is true, Senators. The contest in Alabama was to break the control of the railroads over the State, and to have an equalized freight rate—I mean a rate that was not made as high as the traffic would stand. On that occasion I made the fight for the people, just as in this case. Notwithstanding I am a spinner, notwithstanding I belong to the class who would not ordinarily make the fight, I am fighting for the people in this matter to break the power to gamble on this great product; and I am greatly surprised that there should be any objectors here or anywhere else to this move we are trying to make.

A man who won the office of governor of his State and now is United States Senator is a man of achievement.

I am a southerner; my wife and all our kinfolk are southerners. We are southern in our sympathies, and I have only the best interests of the South at heart. And with this knowledge of and sympathy for the South, I believe that this Comer amendment will hurt the cotton farmer as nothing in our time has done. It is a spinner's bill, for the benefit of the spinners, and that benefit will accrue at the expense of the man who grows cotton.

To appreciate how much of a spinners' bill this is, it should be understood that low-grade cotton is far more expensive to make into fabric than is the high-grade staple. Labor in the mills is largely on piecework basis. A worker can not handle low-grade material so rapidly as he can the high grade; consequently there is dissatisfaction among the workers when too large a percentage of the staple is of the lower grades. As the workers' output and pay is reduced by the low grades, so the output of the mill is reduced.

He is writing that to show that this is a spinners' contract, because, by George, he has got it into his head that we can go back to the exchanges and get our cotton. Now, that has been proven nonsense forever, and yet this man comes and repeats it. It is nonsense. Why, we go on the market to get our cotton. We go where the cotton is sold to get our cotton. We do not go to the exchanges for it.

Under these conditions it at once becomes clear why the spinner wants high-grade cotton.

Why, of course, that is why he wants high-grade cotton—because he can make more money out of it, and his demand for it makes it higher. If he could make more money out of low-grade cotton, would he not go and buy it? And if you do not pass this measure what is there to compel him to take any grade of cotton that he does not want? Why, it is a simple market game, just like anything else is. A man goes to the market and buys what he desires, what he can make the most money out of; and the fact that you change this from a lower to a higher grade contract would not change the consumption, would not change the amount used in the mills by one single bale. It could not do it. How could it do it? It is nonsense to troll a minnow like that before reasonable people.

Under these conditions, it at once becomes clear why the spinner wants high-grade cotton—

And yet that man is trying to insinuate that we are making the delivery half-and-half because we want high-grade cotton. His head is not wide enough open to see that we have got to go to the market for high-grade cotton, and the fact that the high grade is made tenderable here to stabilize the market is not to enable the spinner to go there to get a bale.

I do not understand how an exchange man, one who has sense enough to be on the exchange, can continue to reiterate a statement like that.

Under these conditions, it at once becomes clear why the spinner wants high-grade cotton, particularly at the present, when the demand for strictly high-grade cloths is larger than ever.

That is exactly why he wants it. The demand for high-grade cloths is larger than ever.

The Comer amendment would make for just this condition which the spinners want.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, what is the Senator reading from, and what is the date of it?

Mr. COMER. I am reading from Bache's circular, which was sent to me a day or two ago, dated April 30.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Whose circular?

Mr. COMER. J. S. Bache & Co., of New York; good, big people.

Mr. SHEPPARD. What is the date of it?

Mr. COMER. April 30. I got it this week. It was sent to me by a Senator. Some gentleman had sent it to him with the letter which I read, and the Senator sent it to me to answer.

Mr. SHEPPARD. They are cotton brokers, are they?

Mr. COMER. Yes; they are cotton commission men and extensive dealers; among the very best.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Cotton commission men?

Mr. COMER. Yes; exchange members.

The Comer amendment would make for just this condition which the spinners want. It would force the delivery of high-grade raw material to the tremendous disadvantage of the grower, whose crop can not be all strictly high grade.

Now, Senators, that is immaculate nonsense. The amendment would have no such effect. The amendment simply forces the contract quotation to a value commensurate with the selling price of the cotton—that is all—and the very minute the contract price goes higher than the market that very minute contract values would go down. Of course, they would. That is the way the contract market adjusts itself.

I will read an extract from the speech of the Senator from Louisana [Mr. RANSDELL] in the RECORD of May 8.

Mr. COMER. It is on page 7281, in the left-hand column, about middleway of the page:

Obviously the immediate effect of the Comer amendment will be to upset dealings in cotton which require hedging, because a man will hesitate to sell a hedge under which he may be required to deliver more cotton above the grade of middling than he may possibly be able to command. At the same time the buyers of the large ratio of low-grade cottons still to be sold will be enabled to hammer the price upon the contention that such cottons will not be tenderable on contract.

Now, the Senator makes this mistake there—that is, that the exchange is a clearing house for merchandise. The exchange is a clearing house of prices. The exchange does not clear cotton. It is the index of price; and when you say that this amendment will have a tendency to hurt low-grade cotton and to increase the price of high-grade cotton, you deny every single law of economics—every single one. It is nonsense. It is not so. It could not be so; and all this exchange insinuation is done for the purpose of influencing the men who live in States where they have low-grade cotton, all this insinuation that it will hurt off-grade cotton, they know is not true.

At the same time the buyers of the large ratio of low-grade cottons still to be sold will be enabled to hammer the price upon the contention that such cottons will not be tenderable on contract.

Now, Senator, if you will excuse me for the expression, you said at the beginning of this controversy that you did not understand these things. Well, that statement shows clearly that you do not understand this matter, because that statement could not be made by a man who did understand it. We are buyers of low-grade cotton. We buy thousands of bales of it. We go into the market to buy it. We go where it is for sale in the market; and the contention that if this amendment passes it would not be tenderable, or if it was tenderable it would hurt the value of it, is not so. The tenderable value could only be the spot value. If every bale of cotton was tenderable it could not be higher than the spot value, I do not care where it is; and it is the buying of cotton in the markets and the price that is gotten together by the Bureau of Markets and used as the exchange value on cotton.

The Senator says:

In the present situation, under the Comer amendment, it is a very reckless man who would agree to deliver, say, in September, any large volume of white middling cotton except at a price far beyond the present quotations.

That is so, but yet we do it. If we want cotton delivered in September we go on the exchange and hedge it. We could hedge any month; but, mark you, the buyer himself, the seller himself, puts a ratio of value as compared to exchange value. I read you the other day where the exchange price of good middling cotton was 350 points above middling. That is what they would sell it at. They would sell you a thousand bales of good middling cotton at 350 points over middling basis. That is what it meant, and you can do it to-day. Of course, the price is higher. We all understand that; but if a man wants that grade, and he has to have that grade, he pays the price.

Then the seller goes on the exchange and hedges the sale. What I am trying to do is to have the hedge based on the price of spot middling cotton and not on the basis price middling, which price is now, as I have repeatedly shown, being oscillated up and down by a fictitious arrangement of the prices of off grades.

The Senator said:

At the same time the buyers of the large ratio of low-grade cottons still to be sold will be enabled to hammer the price upon the contention that such cottons will not be tenderable on contract. In the present situation, under the Comer amendment, it is a very reckless man who would agree to deliver, say, in September, any large volume of white middling cotton except at a price far beyond the present quotations. At the same time, a man would be as equally reckless who would agree, under that amendment, to purchase for September delivery cotton below middling at present quotations, if such cotton should be denied the privilege of tender on contract.

What has tender on contract to do with it? There is tender on thousands of bales of cotton bought on basis middling, above or below, as the case may be. You can do that any day, and always could do it, and always will be able to, and you can do it under the amendment. You can do it more safely under the amendment than you can the other way, because under the amendment the prices are stabilized. That is what we are contending for. You know what you are doing, and when you say it is a spinner's contract, it refers to every man who uses cotton legitimately, and the three—consumer, dealer, and spinner—are the ultimate consideration in the cotton prices.

He says further:

The result to be reasonably expected from the Comer amendment is an artificial enhancement of the price of cotton above middling, and a corresponding depreciation of the price of cotton below middling.

Everybody understands that the very date the amendment goes into effect basis middling would advance. Everybody knows that. But how on earth that should affect the farmer injuriously is more than I can understand, and, as Mr. Lyday, of Texas, well said, the very fact that the exchange price of middling would go up will have a tendency to draw the lower grades up. He said that, and he said it very wisely, because it is true, and you can not get beyond it.

Senator, you asked me a question the other day. May I ask you a question now?

Mr. RANSDELL. Certainly.

Mr. COMER. You asked me the other day who paid for this advertisement we were getting up, and I answered you very truthfully. May I ask you who pays for all this camouflage that the exchanges are getting out?

Mr. RANSDELL. I do not know anything about it. I do not know of any camouflage they are getting out.

Mr. COMER. You do not?

Mr. RANSDELL. No, sir.

Mr. COMER. Have you been reading this stuff they get up?

Mr. RANSDELL. To what camouflage do you allude?

Mr. COMER. This which you read. Let me show you. What is contained in this paper is camouflage.

Mr. RANSDELL. I read to you the other day, when this bill was under consideration, a letter from the president of the cotton exchange, Mr. Butler.

Mr. COMER. Yes.

Mr. RANSDELL. He is the president of that great association in New Orleans which we know as the New Orleans Cotton Exchange. He was on a visit to the city of Washington and wrote that letter in response to questions from me. He had been on to New York. He is now on his way to Europe.

Mr. COMER. That is not what I am driving at.

Mr. RANSDELL. What are you driving at?

Mr. COMER. Who pays Mr. Bowen?

Mr. RANSDELL. I do not know.

Mr. COMER. Who pays Mr. Calvin?

Mr. RANSDELL. I do not know.

Mr. COMER. Who pays for all these circulars which go through here?

Mr. RANSDELL. I do not know anything about that.

Mr. COMER. They get paid, do they not?

Mr. RANSDELL. I can not answer that question. I know nothing about who pays them.

Mr. COMER. I am sorry.

Mr. RANSDELL. I know nothing about it.

Mr. COMER. You do not know how these circulars are paid for, who pays for them?

Mr. RANSDELL. Senator, will you please designate to what circulars you allude? Name them. Put them down. What circulars have I used that were paid for by anybody? I wish you would show them to me. I have not used any paid circulars. I read here a telegram from Mr. I. N. McAllister, of my State, who is the president of the farmers' union. I read a telegram from Mr. Arthur Morgan, who is the secretary of that farmers' union in Louisiana. I read a telegram from Mr. Whitehurst, of the State of Oklahoma, president of the State board of agriculture, Oklahoma City. If you will tell me just what circulars I have used——

Mr. COMER. I was under the impression that you had quoted from some circulars other than those.

Mr. RANSDELL. No, Senator; you are mistaken.

Mr. COMER. I am glad you corrected it.

Mr. RANSDELL. I will tell you what I read. I read a letter from Mr. W. B. Thompson, addressed to Mr. Wanamaker, and I commented in full on that. I read from a letter of Mr. Leroy Percy, of Greenville, Miss., addressed to yourself, and I commented very fully on that. I commented on what happened at the Montgomery convention, and read from their resolutions. But if I read from any circulars or any letters other than that, I do not know it. Of course, I read that letter from Mr. Butler, president of the New Orleans Cotton Exchange, and so stated at the time. You are mistaken, Senator. I do not recollect reading any of these circulars.

Mr. COMER. I am very glad I am mistaken, Senator. There have been hundreds of these circulars sent through, and evidently at great expense.

There have been hundreds of telegrams sent through by the exchanges. In fact, all the opposition to this amendment practically has come that way. I want to congratulate the Senator and others for the splendid defense they have made of the New Orleans Exchange. You stand by your State, Senator. You believe in State rights, do you not?

Mr. RANSDELL. I thank the Senator for his compliment.

Mr. COMER. I believe also that Louisiana stood very strongly by the Louisiana lottery, but you were not there then; I am not referring to you.

Mr. RANSDELL. Louisiana abolished the lottery a great many years ago. I was quite a young man at the time, and I do not remember very much about the history of that. I was trying to make a living in north Louisiana as a young, struggling lawyer. But it is a great many years ago; and Louisiana abolished it without any outside help, I may say. Our own people abolished it.

Mr. COMER. I thought the Government did.

Mr. RANSDELL. Oh, no, sir. The Senator is mistaken. It was abolished by the Louisiana people. The Government did pass some laws restricting the transportation of lottery tickets in the mails, and then the managers of that lottery carried it on very successfully through the medium of the express service. Then, largely under the leadership of the present Chief Justice of the United States, Edward Douglass White, and former United States Senator Murphy J. Foster, who were very active in the effort, the lottery was abolished long ago by the people of Louisiana themselves.

Mr. COMER. I knew you were very loyal to your State, not only in the lottery business, away back yonder, but also in the matter of tariff, and I want to compliment you for all those things.

Mr. RANSDELL. I try to stand by all the legitimate and proper interests of my State, and I endeavored to make it clear during this debate that I was speaking first and foremost for the cotton producers of my State, being a humble producer myself; and, secondly, for that big business institution of my State, the cotton exchange, trying to defend it from what I thought were not quite fair attacks; and especially my personal friend, Mr. W. B. Thompson, who I thought was unfairly assailed; and as he was not here to speak for himself, I thought I would have to talk for my friend. I will do it every time, and the Senator would, too. He would not respect me if I did not defend my friend.

Mr. COMER. You made a very good talk, Senator, I am sorry to say, not for the good in the exchange but defending a lot of the evils in the exchange. The good of the exchange we are trying to sustain; the evils of the exchange we are trying to correct, that is all.

Mr. RANSDELL. There is a vast difference of opinion frequently, you know, between good men. The Senator is entitled, of course, to his opinion, just as I am entitled to mine.

Mr. COMER. It depends very largely on the question of environment.

Mr. RANSDELL. Yes; it certainly does. And I am a farmer who raises cotton and likes to sell it at a good, high price. The Senator from Alabama spins that cotton, and naturally likes to buy it at a good, low price. There is just the difference. It is a question of whose ox is being gored.

Mr. COMER. Senator, when you make a law by which one man or set of men influence the market, higher or lower, then that law is dangerous; on the contrary, when two parties are in the market, one selling and the other buying, and the laws of supply and demand are unrestricted, unbiased, then both parties have free use of every facility afforded by the supply and demand markets of the world, and as long as both the cotton producer and cotton spinner go into the markets of the world and buy and sell, untrammeled by interference from anybody or any special devices by anybody, that is safe, and that is what we want. This is what governs and controls the business of the world, and any interference with same has always proven disastrous to the producer and hurtful to the manufacturer and consumer.

Mr. RANSDELL. In regard to that, I would like to say that there have been future markets for a great many years, and Congress took up the question of regulating them several years ago. There was very prolonged debate on the subject for several years. In 1914, after the most prolonged discussion, we passed several very stringent regulatory provisions in regard to dealings on the exchanges in the New York market and the New Orleans market, and we have been getting along, I assume, fairly well under those changes and regulations which were made at that time. Last year—not quite a year ago—the Congress in its wisdom sought to further regulate. A slight change was made, and it was very fully considered. I did not hear of anybody opposing it particularly. But now—and, of course, I say this with all due respect—when the Senator, by an amendment, wants to completely annul the effect of the law passed in 1914, I say that the fair thing to do is to thrash the matter out very fully in committee, to let us hear both sides before doing it.

Mr. COMER. Senator——

Mr. RANSDELL. I yield.

Mr. COMER. It is my floor, you know.

Mr. RANSDELL. All right; you have the floor.

Mr. COMER. You say the amendment annuls. Do you speak that knowingly?

Mr. RANSDELL. That is the way I construe it. No, Senator; I do not speak it knowingly. I say that is my construction of it.

Mr. COMER. That is the construction which the exchanges explain to you—that it will annul it. You do not know it?

Mr. RANSDELL. I have read to you, Senator, all the views of the exchange that have been given to me. I read Mr. Thompson's letter; I read Mr. Percy's letter.

Mr. COMER. I understood you got your views from those?

Mr. RANSDELL. I got my views from those and from my own common sense. I claim to have just a little bit of common sense, and I have applied what little the Lord endowed me with to construing the provisions of your amendment.

Mr. COMER. I want to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that all of this trouble in the House and in the Senate has come from exchange propaganda.

Mr. RANSDELL. Absolutely not.

Mr. COMER. It is their statements that have made it, and when you say the amendment will annul your cotton-futures act, that is the very furthest from the fact. Instead of annulling it, it will make it better; it will put it on a higher basis and protect every legal business engaged in it.

Mr. RANSDELL. The Senator is hardly stating that fairly. Senator Leroy Percy, of Greenville, Miss., is not an exchange man. Mr. A. P. Learned, of Natchez, Miss., is a cotton producer. He is not an exchange man, so far as I know and believe. Mr. I. N. McAllister is not an exchange man. He lives in the hills of north Louisiana and is president of the Farmers' Union. Mr. Arthur Morgan is not an exchange man. I have introduced a good many witnesses here besides members of the exchange. Mr. Whitehurst, president of the State Board of Agriculture, of Oklahoma, I assume is not an exchange man, though I do not know positively. I do not think there is an exchange in the State of Oklahoma. I have brought in a good deal of evidence besides that of the exchanges. You brought in evidence to show that at the great cotton convention at Alabama the vote was 16 to 15 in favor of your amendment. That was supposed to be farmers.

The votes of several of the States were against the amendment. That influenced me somewhat.

Mr. COMER. All the propaganda that I have seen or heard of anywhere and all the influence against the amendment has come from the exchanges. I have not heard of a single solitary bit of it coming any other way.

May I say to the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GAY] that in the article he placed in the RECORD Monday this statement is made:

This mischievous and interested meddling with the complex machinery of the cotton trade would be harmful to the cotton producer, spinner, and merchant—

He says this is hurtful to the spinner. He goes on a bit further:

This mischievous and interested meddling with the complex machinery of the cotton trade would be harmful to the cotton producer, spinner, and merchant, and to the users of cotton goods, for the following reasons:

The paramount value of the future cotton is its hedge or protective value. It was never intended that such contracts should take the place of specific grade and staple contracts between the spinner and the merchant, and it can never become such substitute.

This man makes a clean statement, Senator, just exactly like we have been contending. That is a clean, clear-cut statement of every contention of ours.

Going on further, he says that it will hurt the spinner and the consumer; in fact, the whole business; and then says:

The future contract is used by the cotton trade as a policy of insurance against price fluctuations.

That is all true. I know that is true.

The spinner desiring to contract ahead for his manufactured product and not having the stock in hand and probably not procurable except out of the crop not yet made or even planted, may so contract with impunity if he can go into the future market and protect himself against loss by the purchase of a hedge. When the actual supplies are needed he goes into the spot market and purchases the particular grade and staple required for his mill, and he thereupon closes out his protective contract or, in other words, cancels his price insurance policy.

Then a little further down he says:

If either the spinner or merchant elects to take actual delivery on the future contract when the same matures, they can use such grades and staples as may be under their needs or contracts usable, and the residue may be delivered on future contracts sold against the same.

That is the old method. Under the old method they would buy, say, a thousand bales of contract cotton and have it delivered. They would select out of this 200 or 500 bales, and resell the balance on the exchange, and they would continue to do that until it became just dregs. It is just like taking coffee grounds and boiling them over and over again.

He says this:

In order that there may be both buyers and sellers, it is necessary that the terms of the future contract must be fair to both, and that it shall contain no pitfalls for either.

That is exactly what we want, fair to both and no pitfalls for either. That is the kind of contract we want, and that is what the amendment carries out. It does not mean anything else.

Mr. RANSDELL. May I inquire of the Senator if he has placed in the RECORD any letters or telegrams from producers urging the passage of his amendment—I mean producers, the men who raise the cotton?

Mr. COMER. Yes; I think I have.

Mr. RANSDELL. Will the Senator be good enough to refer me to them?

Mr. COMER. I do not recollect just at this moment. I have made a fight for farmers for 10 years of my life, and I want to say that it is the rarest thing ever that you ever get a letter from a farmer. That is the rarest thing ever. If you fight for a farmer you have got to take the lead and keep it. You have to fight on what you know about the case. If you take the statement made just a while ago that I read from the New York Journal of Commerce, they said I made the fight in Alabama for lower freight rates, freight rates which helped every farmer in Alabama, and yet I made that fight by myself. I had no letters of commendation from them. You do not get them. It is from the interests, the camouflaged interests, that you get those things from. It always was so and always will be so. You touch their interest and you touch all the propaganda they can get out, but the farmers' interest you never hear a word from, never.

Mr. RANSDELL. I have put in the RECORD several communications from farmers.

Mr. COMER. They did not do it. The only thing I have seen from the farmer on your side is from a farmer in Arkansas.

Mr. RANSDELL. Possibly not, but I have every right to assume that these people who telegraphed me and who sent me communications are farmers, as did the presidents of the farmers' associations, men that I know are farmers, and I have a right to assume that this letter from Mr. Whitehurst is from a farmer, and I believe it was from a farmer.

Mr. COMER. It may be possible, but I guarantee that every single solitary line of it came from the exchanges. It always does. I never heard of one of them coming in any other way.

Mr. RANSDELL. I should like to have the Senator show me, if he can, in any of the speeches he has made here, one single solitary indorsement from a farmer, from a man who produces crops.

Mr. COMER. I will not do it to-day, but I will send them to you. I have them.

Mr. RANSDELL. I mean in the RECORD.

Mr. COMER. I will put them in the RECORD if you want it.

Mr. RANSDELL. I thought the Senator had put them in, substantiating his own case.

Mr. COMER. I do not recollect.

Mr. RANSDELL. I put in all I had.

Mr. COMER. I am sure you did.

TERMINATION OF WAR WITH GERMANY.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 327) terminating the state of war declared to exist April 6, 1917, between the Imperial German Government and the United States, permitting on conditions the resumption of reciprocal trade with Germany, and for other purposes.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, my committee engagements have interfered very materially with my desire to investigate the interesting constitutional aspects of the pending peace resolution as fully as I desired. Inasmuch, however, as an engagement made some time ago requires me to speak upon the resolution this afternoon, if I discuss it at all, I have determined to present to the Senate some views which I entertain regarding its character, and particularly as it involves the organic powers of Congress.

I am as anxious for the resumption of peace conditions in the United States as any man in this body can be. I deplore as deeply as anyone the continued unrest and discontent which prevalent anomalous conditions justify. We are neither at war nor at peace. Like Mahomet's coffin, we are suspended somewhere between the two.

Hostilities ceased long ago. Demobilization of the American Expeditionary Forces was completed many months since. Cancellation of war contracts, sale of war materials, the dissolution of improvised war boards, the manufacture of equipment for the Army and for the Navy—all these are matters of the past. American business, American manufacturers, the industries which are characteristic of peace time have long since been resumed, and yet we are not at peace. The laws are in force; the courts are engaged in the administration of justice; the lines of transportation have been restored to their owners—indeed, it is difficult to conceive of any specific condition affecting business, industry, economics, or agriculture, except as regards the labor condition, which did not characterize our people and their pursuits prior to the 6th day of April, 1917.

But we are not at peace. The fiction of a war status still prevails, and must be and remain with us until something effectual is done to remove it.

This resolution is designed to accomplish the change. It has been prepared by the ablest constitutional lawyer on the Republican side of the Senate. It has been carefully considered and reported from the committee, the majority of whose members belong to his political faith. It has received the sanction of that majority. Originally it was a House resolution, for which it has been substituted, and which, after considerable discussion, was passed by a decided majority.

Now, if the Congress has power to enact a measure of this sort, I see no reason why it should not exercise that power. If it has no such authority, then the time consumed in its consideration will have been wasted. Those who advocate the resolution as a matter of course go upon the theory that such power exists. Those who oppose it do so in part for political reasons, while others of them are actuated by the sincere conviction, however erroneous, that its enactment will constitute an invasion of Executive authority.

The Congress, ever since I have been a Member of the Senate, has never lost an opportunity to denounce Executive invasions of its prerogatives. More anathemas have been thundered against the President of the United States in this Chamber during the last seven years, because of his actual or assumed invasion of legislative authority, than I could recite in a fortnight.

The indignant remonstrances of Senators and Representatives, jealous of their authority and jurisdiction, determined to safeguard it against Executive encroachment, have characterized not only Republican but some Democratic discussion. In a few instances they have seemed to be justified.

Those who have so protested should see to it that while directing attention to the beam in the presidential eye they should not overlook the motes in their own. They should be as prone to refrain from an invasion of presidential authority as they are swift to denounce that authority when it transgresses their own.

The first question, therefore, which occurs to me regarding this resolution concerns the power and authority of Congress to enact it. In that connection it must be remembered, Mr. President, that this is very much more than a repealing resolution. It contains an elaborate proviso, supplemented by two additional sections, which constitute the substance of the measure, and it is with these that we are concerned in determining the extent of our legislative power. That Congress may repeal any law which it has enacted goes without saying. Of course, a repeal is impossible which affects vested rights based upon previous legislation; and no repeal of a legislative declaration can alter the fact forming the basis thereof if that fact actually exists. If, for example, a state of war actually existed between Germany and the United States on the 6th day of April, 1917, our repeal of our declaration to that effect does not alter the fact. It merely recognizes that at the time of the passage of the repealing statute or resolution that state of war no longer exists.

I make no question, therefore, Mr. President, that if Congress in its wisdom determined that a resolution repealing the act of April 6, 1917, should be enacted, it would be clearly within its power so to do. Hence I am not concerned with the simple question of the right of repeal, because that is not the pending resolution; that is merely an incident of the resolution; the moving cause for its preparation and proposed enactment. The purpose of the measure is to create a status between belligerents, determining, among other things, property rights and mutual claims of nationals, both against respective governments and each other, basing our authority to do so upon the assumption that we are merely enacting a repealing statute. If I am correct, Mr. President, in that assumption—which, I have no doubt, will be vigorously controverted—then we should be concerned with what follows the recital of repeal, leaving that practically out of the question.

This brings us to the proposition, Has the Congress of the United States the power to make peace? If it has, then there should be an end to the discussion of authority. If it has not, then the proviso and succeeding sections—except, perhaps, the last one, dealing with the former Empire of Austria-Hungary, the dual monarchy—are the exercise of a peace-making function, always belonging to the executive of a nation, in the absence of constitutional provisions to the contrary.

Mr. President, the question is not a new one; but, notwithstanding its age, it is ever interesting, always the subject of controversy, and never yet fully determined. We must consider it from the viewpoint of fundamental principles, for the proceedings of the Constitutional Convention give us very little information regarding it. Those proceedings were secret; they were private; they were rigidly safeguarded from public knowledge. The only records we have consist of the daily memoranda of Mr. Madison, one of the members of the convention, and what are known as Yates' Secret Debates, covering only a part of the session, and ending, as I recall, about August 17, 1787; but they do throw a little light upon the proposition.

When the war powers of the new Government were under consideration, the committee having charge of the subject reported a resolution to the effect that "Congress shall have power to make war"; but, inasmuch as the word "make" seemed to be too comprehensive, broad enough, in fact, to include the waging and prosecution as well as the making of war, the word "declare" was substituted for the word "make," as that language now appears in the Constitution. "Congress shall have power to declare war." It has not the power to wage it, except in so far as legislation providing supplies and equipment for armies, and so forth, is concerned. Before the paragraph was finally accepted, however, another amendment was offered, so as to make the phrase read "Congress shall have power to declare war and make peace." That became the subject of discussion, to what extent, as I have intimated, posterity is not informed; but the amendment, after consideration, was unanimously rejected, doubtless because that generation, having the experiences of the Continental Congress before it and fully alive to the defects of the Articles of Confederation, properly determined that the power to make peace should not be expressly conferred upon the Congress but remain with the Executive.

The only inference I can draw from that incident, Mr. President, is that the framers of the Constitution in their wisdom determined to divide the ancient prerogative of the Crown, including both the power to declare war and the power to make peace, between the legislative and executive departments, giving to the former the power to declare war, and leaving to the latter the authority to make peace. That the provision was wise in a republican form of government needs no argument, for, since the people wage war, it is they, through their representatives, who should declare it, but since the making of peace involves, or is apt to involve, infinite controversy and to affect many important considerations between the belligerents requiring negotiation, the exercise of diplomacy, and a full consideration of all that might result from the covenants of the contract—for that is what a treaty is—and inasmuch as in all such matters concentration of authority in a single individual is infinitely better than its diffusion among a large number, the power to make peace was negatively included in the executive powers of the Chief Magistrate.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. When the Senator says that the framers of the Constitution confided to Congress the power to declare war, does he mean the exclusive and entire power?

Mr. THOMAS. The entire power in the sense that all other legislative power is conferred upon it. Of course, it must be done by joint resolution requiring Executive approval.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That is what I am coming to, of course. Does the Senator think that the President has the power to veto a declaration of war by Congress?

Mr. THOMAS. I do.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Then, of course, the Congress would have the power to declare war the veto of the President to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. THOMAS. It has the power to act precisely as it has to act upon other forms of legislation; that is my opinion.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Then, I assume that the Senator would admit that the Congress had power to declare peace in the same way.

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; Mr. President, I think the Congress would have the power to declare peace in the same way, provided its declaration is limited to a cessation of hostilities; but when it comes to fixing conditions and terms upon which the peace resolution becomes effective, I must part company with the Senator; that is, if I may judge from the Senator's question that my position does not appeal to his judgment.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Of course, this is more or less of a novel and complicated question——

Mr. THOMAS. It is complicated, but it is not novel.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It may not be entirely novel, but in the way in which it is presented now it is somewhat unusual, and the circumstances are unusual, too; but what I was coming to was this: If Congress does have power to declare that a state of war exists, the Senator would not doubt that we had authority to repeal the joint resolution by which we did declare the status of war to exist?

Mr. THOMAS. I so stated at the opening of my remarks.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I was not on the floor when the Senator said so.

Mr. THOMAS. I so stated.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator is aware, of course, that the joint resolution which Congress did pass in relation to the matter in question was not a formal declaration of war, with no acts preceding it; but Congress specifically declared, at the suggestion of the President, that inasmuch as the Imperial German Government had committed repeated acts of war upon us, therefore Congress declared that a state of war did formally exist. They made a formal declaration that the status of war created by the acts of Germany existed.

Mr. THOMAS. Of course, the Senator is aware of the fact that every congressional declaration of war assumed that form. We never declared war in any other form than that a state of war existed because of the conduct or misconduct of the adversary.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. And whatever constituted the state of war which Congress formally declared or recognized at that time had been done by the Imperial German Government, and in no part by us.

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; that is correct.

Mr. President, it is extremely difficult to draw a distinct line of demarcation between the power of Congress by joint resolution to create peace, so to speak, to bring about peace by a repealing resolution, and its power to fix terms upon which the resolution is to become effective, or terms and conditions of any sort accompanying the declaration.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NUGENT in the chair). Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. THOMAS. I do.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator made that assertion once before, and I intended to allude to it when I rose before, but I was diverted. Do I understand the Senator to say that Congress, in its declaration that a state of war no longer exists, or in its repeal of its previous declaration of a state of war, can not state the conditions upon which the present repeal shall take effect?

Mr. THOMAS. I would not make a statement as broad as that.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I beg the Senator's pardon; I misapprehended him. I thought he did.

Mr. THOMAS. No; on the contrary, I am very grateful to the Senator for calling my attention to it. What I said was designed to apply to this specific joint resolution. I distinctly disclaim authority or ability or capacity to announce a general proposition which would distinctly define and fix the limitations between legislative and executive power in a matter of that sort; but I think that we can perhaps determine by specific instances like the one before us upon which side of such a line the attempted exercise of power may be classified.

As said by the Senator, this is in one sense a new subject; that is to say, it is always new, and I presume always will be, since it is a subject upon which the best and the ablest men must differ, and since there is no tribunal of which I have any knowledge to which the question can be submitted for decision, except as an incident to something else. It is the exercise of a political power, and concerns a distinctly political subject, with which the judicial power has nothing to do, except in so far as conditions arising which lead to controversy may make it necessary to define some specific legislative act, or to fix some specific date as the beginning of new or different conditions.

I shall not undertake to say, and I do not think it would be edifying if I did, on how many occasions this has been the subject of debate. I shall content myself by referring to but one historic incident, and that is the admission of the State of Texas by joint resolution of Congress.

Senators will recall that under the administration of Mr. Tyler a treaty was negotiated between the young Republic of Texas and the United States, under the terms of which, and subject to certain conditions subsequent, the State of Texas was to be admitted into the Union, and to become one of its sovereign Commonwealths. That treaty aroused a bitter and somewhat chronic controversy, resulting in 1837, if I remember correctly, in a rejection of the treaty by the Senate. Shortly afterwards, the next presidential election approaching, the Democratic Party nominated James K. Polk, and the Whig Party Henry Clay, as their respective candidates for the Chief Magistracy, and the issue of Texas became quite as overshadowing as the issue of ratification of the pending treaty may become in the presidential election of 1920. Mr. Clay was defeated by a small popular majority very largely because of his somewhat indefinite attitude upon the subject of Texas. Mr. Polk, urged by the more dominant will of Andrew Jackson, espoused the cause of Texas and Oregon, and was elected, as I have said, largely upon that issue.

During the closing days of Mr. Tyler's administration a series of joint resolutions, varying in many particulars from each other, but all having the common purpose of admitting Texas, was introduced first in the House and then in the Senate, culminating finally in the adoption of a joint resolution by a very considerable majority, and that joint resolution received the approval of the President only a very short time before his term expired, under which Texas was admitted into the Union. The incident furnishes one of the most interesting discussions of constitutional power that can be found in the records of Congress. The opponents of the measure, I think very properly, contended that the admission of a distinct and separate sovereignty into the American Union could not be brought about by a joint resolution, but must be the subject of negotiation and agreement. It was contended, of course, in support of the joint resolution, that the power to admit States, being without limitation, applied indefinitely, and, instead of being confined to a territory of the United States existing at the time of the ratification of the Constitution, was applicable under any circumstances and in any case where the admission of a State was desired.

The resolution contained conditions and requirements to which the Republic of Texas must accede; and one of the strongest arguments made against its constitutionality, among others, was the fact that under the Constitution Senators are required to have been citizens of the United States for nine years at the time of their election, and Members of the House of Representatives are required to have been such citizens for seven years, which, of course, would be out of the question in the event of the acceptance by Texas of the terms of the joint resolution and her consequent absorption into the Union.

I believe that that joint resolution was unconstitutional, but it was effective, quite effective, immediately effective; and inasmuch as no means could be supplied for testing the constitutionality of the joint resolution by the judicial department, which, perhaps, would be without jurisdiction in the premises under any circumstances, it has been accepted and sanctified by the verdict of time and offers, in my judgment, the best, if not the only, precedent for the joint resolution now under consideration.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado further yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Does the Senator remember whether the question was raised in either branch of Congress under the clause of the Constitution which makes each House the judge of the qualifications and election of its own Members?

Mr. THOMAS. I think it was. I say that with some confidence, because both Houses of Congress numbered among their Members the very best legal talent in the country. It was the epoch of Webster and Benton and Calhoun and that great galaxy of statesmen of the former century who made the Congress of the United States illustrious by their discussions of all of the great questions, then entirely novel, which presented themselves from time to time in proposed legislation.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I am not familiar with the legislative history of that period by any recent reading of it, and I do not remember what that fact was; but if the question was raised, then, in the opinion of both Houses, the act must have been constitutional, if they received the Senators and Representatives from that State.

Mr. THOMAS. There was acquiescence in the joint resolution.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. And if the question was not raised, it must have been tacitly accepted.

Mr. THOMAS. I am satisfied that it was raised.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I have no doubt that it must have been.

Mr. THOMAS. But after the controversy was brought to a culmination by the enactment of the resolution all further opposition, except in the way of protest, disappeared.

The slavery question was then very active, and its proponents and opponents kept the question alive for a number of years succeeding. The historians who deal with the subject, in the expression of their views regarding the validity of the resolution, are very naturally influenced in some degree by its political phases, from which no man can fully separate himself, however earnestly he may try to do so.

So much, then, Mr. President, by way of history. If any Senator desires, as a matter of interest, to investigate the question further, he will find a most instructive book upon the subject entitled "The President's Authority Over Foreign Affairs," by Prof. Corwin, of Princeton University; but I can not give any more time to its elaboration.

I come now to the joint resolution, and read from the Senate committee's substitute for the joint resolution as passed by the House:

> That the joint resolution of Congress passed April 6, 1917, declaring a state of war to exist between the Imperial German Government and the Government and people of the United States, and making provisions to prosecute the same, be, and the same is hereby, repealed, and said state of war is hereby declared at an end.

If the President of the United States should approve a resolution so beginning and so ending, it would become a valid law, one wholly within the province of the Congress to enact, and therefore within the power of the President to accept. But this is attended with a proviso of far-reaching importance, and a proviso is always a limitation of the statute itself. The very name implies its purpose. A certain proposition is enacted into law, "except" or "on condition" or "provided," and what follows may be considered as and is made a part thereof. The proviso reads:

> Provided, however, That all property of the Imperial German Government, or its successor or successors, and of all German nationals which was, on April 6, 1917, in or has since that date come into the possession or under control of the Government of the United States or of any of its officers, agents, or employees, from any source or by any agency whatsoever, shall be retained by the United States and no disposition thereof made, except as shall specifically be hereafter provided by Congress, until such time as the German Government has, by treaty with the United States, ratification whereof is to be made by and with the advice and consent of the Senate—

Of course, that is superfluous—

made suitable provisions for the satisfaction of all claims against the German Government of all persons, wheresoever domiciled—

And so forth.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I will yield in just a moment.

That is, provided that all this property was taken into the possession of our Government and subject to the control of the Congress until a treaty shall be negotiated by Germany, the substance of which treaty is included in the proviso.

I now yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Just in passing, I want to give the reason for the insertion in this proviso of the language which the Senator says is superfluous, to wit, that the treaty is to be ratified by the Senate. It appears on the face of it to be superfluous, but I will state the reason for putting it in.

As the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] informed the committee, the claims which are deposited in the Department of State by our citizens have been held to be subject to whatever settlement the Executive may desire to make of them, and the private citizen, after he has filed his claim and submitted it to the State Department, inasmuch as the settlement of it depends upon negotiations with a foreign power, waives his control over it and it is within the power of the Executive, at least by unbroken precedent, either to abandon the claim or to compromise it or press it and settle it upon any terms which the Executive may desire. That is the reason why the terms made in the German treaty should be subject to ratification by the Senate.

Mr. THOMAS. The reason, Mr. President, is easily understood, but my reason for characterizing it as superfluous is that the Constitution provides expressly that every treaty must have the ratification of the Senate by a specified majority before it becomes a treaty. While I have the very highest respect for the legal ability of the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania, who doubtless is overcautious about the matter, I am unable to see its pertinency in connection with the use of the word "treaty." But, of course, it does no harm. That is merely a digression. Now, let us see what the requirements of this proposed treaty are. It says:

Made suitable provisions for the satisfaction of all claims against the German Government of all persons, wheresoever domiciled, who owe permanent allegiance to the United States, whether such persons have suffered, through the acts of the German Government or its agents since July 31, 1914, loss, damage, or injury to their persons or property, directly or indirectly, through the ownership of shares of stock in German, American, or other corporations, or otherwise, and until the German Government has given further undertakings and made provisions by treaty, to be ratified by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, for granting to persons owing permanent allegiance to the United States most favored nation treatment, whether the same be national or otherwise, in all matters affecting residence, business, profession, trade, navigation, commerce, and industrial property rights, and confirming to the United States all fines, forfeitures, penalties, and seizures imposed or made by the United States during the war, whether in respect to the property of the German Government or German nationals, and waiving any pecuniary claim based on events which occurred at any time before the coming into force of such treaty, any existing treaty between the United States and Germany to the contrary notwithstanding.

And the President is requested to open negotiations for this purpose immediately. If in a repealing resolution a proviso requiring for its effectiveness a treaty containing these terms can be imposed by Congress, then it follows that if it so desires the Congress can impose any other terms, however extensive. It is just as much within our power to condition this resolution upon the ratification of the League of Nations by Germany, or indeed by a third power, as it is to provide for the things we find here.

That is the end of the proviso except the clause:

To these ends, and for the purpose of establishing fully friendly relations and commercial intercourse between the United States and Germany, the President is hereby requested immediately to open negotiations with the Government of Germany.

But the joint resolution goes further and declares:

SEC. 2. That in the interpretation of any provision relating to the date of the termination of the present war or of the present or existing emergency in any acts of Congress, joint resolutions, or proclamations of the President containing provisions contingent upon the date of the termination of the war or of the present or existing emergency, the date when this resolution becomes effective shall be construed and treated as the date of the termination of the war or of the present or existing emergency, notwithstanding any provision in any act of Congress or joint resolution providing any other mode of determining the date of the termination of the war or of the present or existing emergency.

That undoubtedly is within the power of Congress.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, before the Senator proceeds to a discussion of the point to which he is now directing attention, I would like to have his opinion as to whether the proviso which he has just read would not imply that before the war ceased Germany, by some legislative act, would have to accept the provisions of the proviso?

Mr. THOMAS. No; I do not think the resolution is susceptible of that construction, because the proviso relates to property in our possession, taken from German nationals, and not to the repealing clause preceding it. But it does involve the determination by a treaty, the terms of which are dictated, of the ultimate relations between the two warring nations growing out of their war.

Mr. KING. If I may trespass further upon the Senator's time, pending the negotiation of that treaty what must ensue in the interregnum? Is there a state of war or is it a state of peace? Are we not in the same situation we are in now?

Mr. THOMAS. For all practical purposes we are in the same condition, I think, we are in now, because section 3 provides:

That until by treaty or act or joint resolution of Congress it shall be determined otherwise, the United States, although it has not ratified the treaty of Versailles, does not waive any of the rights, privileges, indemnities, reparations, or advantages to which it and its nationals have become entitled under the terms of the armistice signed November 11, 1918, or any extension or modifications thereof or which under the treaty of Versailles have been stipulated for its benefit as one of the principal allied and associated powers and to which it is entitled.

If these rights, privileges, and indemnities are not waived, notwithstanding our rejection of the treaty, but are claimed under this repealing resolution and withheld until by some other treaty or act or joint resolution it shall be determined otherwise, I fail to see any great difference between our status after the resolution and before. I confess that that part of the resolution surprises me somewhat, emanating, as it does, from the Committee on Foreign Relations. Some members of that committee are unfortunately so mentally constituted that they can not accept the treaty at all, and in that they have my sympathy. Yet, strange to say, they propose to retain all the good things for America in that treaty, notwithstanding their rejection of it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, are there any Members so unfortunate as not to be able to accept the treaty who are not members of the Foreign Relations Committee?

Mr. THOMAS. I do not think many of those were left off the committee on the other side.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I understood the Senator from Colorado himself to be one of those unfortunates, and he is not on the committee.

Mr. THOMAS. A very few of us on this side are equally benighted, and one of them, meaning myself, had to retire from the committee; but that was through the fortune of war.

I have voted against the acceptance of that treaty, and one of the impelling motives driving me to that position rests upon the overwhelming penalties and indemnities which it places upon Germany in contravention of the terms preceding the armistice. I would be compelled to vote against the joint resolution, even if I thought it was entirely within the powers of Congress to enact it, because of section 3. I do not think it reflects much credit upon the American Congress, to be perfectly frank about it, to reject the treaty and then in a resolution declaring peace reserve our right to all the benefits we would have had under and by virtue of the treaty if we had accepted it. I do not think that is good Americanism. I do not think it is justice. The treaty is either good or bad, and we should not take the attitude of hanging onto the material advantages and emoluments which it gives us while at the same time rejecting it in toto.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Although the Senator thinks the treaty is too harsh on Germany, as I understand him——

Mr. THOMAS. No.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. He does not object to insisting that Germany shall compensate this country for the damage she caused us?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; I do; emphatically; because that was our attitude from the time we entered the war. We said this was a war in vindication of our rights upon the sea and against an autocracy, a form of government that was a menace to our civilization. Moreover, in the President's letter of November 5, 1918, to the German chancellor, the extent of reparation was clearly defined, and Germany's acceptance of it was doubtless largely influenced by that fact, a condition which was deliberately and constantly ignored and disregarded by the conference of Versailles.

Mr. President, I think I have discussed the terms of the measure at sufficient length to indicate my position concerning it. I regard it as a clear invasion of the Executive power, as an effort by Congress, if not to exercise, at least to dictate the application of the treaty-making power by the Executive of the United States, a clear overstepping of the boundary fixed by the Constitution and, generally speaking, observed throughout our history between the power to declare war and the power to negotiate for peace.

Moreover, it establishes a precedent which at some time, in a crisis of this country in which, while at war, if a serious breach should occur between the legislative and the executive branches of the Government, and in which the action of the Congress, possessed of a two-thirds majority against the administration, might not only paralyze the military powers of the Government, but very seriously or vitally menace its existence.

In all such legislation he, and he only, is wise who casts his horoscope over the future to perceive, as far as he can, the effect which the influence of such legislation may have at other times and in other crises which the Republic must inevitably encounter so long as human nature remains unchanged.

Mr. President, I listened with extreme interest, as I always do, to the discussion of the joint resolution by the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX]. That he proves his position goes without saying. That he established from his premises that the war long ago ended is evident to all who heard him or who have read his speech. His position in substance was that, inasmuch as we declared war against the Imperial Government, expressly excepting the German people from its operation, politically at least, and inasmuch as the Imperial Government has been overthrown, and inasmuch as the armistice was not an armistice, but a capitulation, ergo, the war came to an end with its execution.

But assuming that to be true, what are we here for at present? Why consider this resolution at all? Is not the capitulation itself a treaty of peace, although made with the German people, against whom we were not waging war?

According to the Senator's argument, we were at peace when the treaty was negotiated. According to his argument we were at peace when the Kaiser abdicated. If not, then surely peace came to a bleeding world when the capitulation was signed and acted upon. Assuming that to be true, then I concede that the semistate of war which has prevailed since the date of those occurrences is wholly unjustifiable. If that be true, then it must follow that the President's announcement on the 11th day of November, 1918, that the war was at an end was his official proclamation of the fact, and, of course, established the date of the end of the war, thereby terminating all of our war legislation.

There seems to be such a thing as proving too much, if this is an instance. If it is necessary for a great lawyer and statesman like the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania to base his argument in support of this resolution upon that hypothesis, then, indeed, it must follow that only by such hypothesis can he justify his resolution.

But certainly we must, in our calmer moments, concede that the statement of the President, in announcing the terms of the armistice to the Congress that the war was at an end, necessarily related to actual hostilities and not to the resumption of the peace relations. Moreover, if it be true, as the Senator says, that we have destroyed the only thing that we were at war with, then why negotiate a peace with the German people, our war having been conducted against their Government and not themselves?

I have always regarded these statements and declarations that we were not at war with the German people as so much camouflage. No man acquainted with the history of the German people, to whom the term Hun has been applied through centuries of time, and who supported the German Imperial Government to a man, not only in Germany but the world over, can keep a straight face and pretend that this war was not waged against Germany in all that that term implies. We fought the Kaiser, we fought the junkers, we fought the German farmers, we fought the German socialists, we fought the German democracy, we fought the German Protestants, we fought the German Catholics, and everything that was German.

Mr. KING. The professors and preachers.

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; including, as the Senator from Utah suggests, the professors and the preachers. We fought all those, for without their support the Imperial German Government never could have moved a finger. They fought as long as that support was available and surrendered and abdicated only when the morale of the people behind the lines collapsed utterly.

So do not let us advocate or oppose this resolution upon any such theory. It will not help us in the election any more than it helped us in the war, for whatever else may be said I do not believe you can fool a Dutchman on that proposition.

The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] this morning discussed the argument of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] quite in extenso. I am unable to add very much to what he has said. But the Senator from Pennsylvania indulged in a most interesting and instructive discussion of war powers and peace powers, their relations to each other, the exercise of the war powers in times of war only, and the exercise of peace powers in times of peace, when all powers under our Constitution are dormant. He said, on page 6564 of the RECORD:

> Since war powers are given for the successful conduct of war, and for that purpose only, it necessarily follows that when the war is ended—
> "Necessarily follows," mind you—
> that is, when actual hostilities cease—the war powers terminate. There is no principle of our constitutional system that is more vital or fundamental than this. Because if this were not the principle, then a mal-minded administration could provoke a war, pass war-power legislation bestowing autocratic power upon executive officers, and then, hostilities having actually ceased, refuse to make formal peace by treaty and so hold the people under an intolerable despotism until revolution would be their only recourse for relief. But reason and principle are against this. From these it follows that when the war is ended by the cessation of actual hostilities, the war powers ipso facto and of necessity at that moment cease, wholly irrespective of any action either by the treaty-making power or by the Congress in reference thereto.

On the same page the Senator said:

> Now, if the foregoing are correct principles, and I submit they are and must be, then since the war powers come into force with the beginning of hostilities and become dormant again with the end of hostilities it necessarily follows that even Congress itself can not exercise those powers before hostilities begin nor after they end. And from this it follows that any attempt by Congress so to do is illegal and unconstitutional.

If that be the correct doctrine, then any attempt to exercise such powers by the administration is unconstitutional and the Executive should be impeached. If that be true—and in the abstract, I presume, it is true—then surely there is not the slightest need for the passage of this resolution; because if it is unconstitutional for Congress to exercise any war power except during the existence of actual hostilities, it is equally unconstitutional for it to declare, or to assume 18 months after those hostilities have ceased, that the war still continues; in other words, if, from a constitutional standpoint, war and hostilities are convertible terms, and if war powers cease when hostilities cease, then all the war powers exerted, either by the Congress or by the administration, since the 11th day of November, 1918, have been extra constitutional; and that is what we should say in terms by this resolution instead of providing for a termination of the war, plus a conditional treaty to be imposed upon Germany for the purpose of effectuating it.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an inquiry?

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly.

Mr. KING. If the statement made by the Senator from Pennsylvania, just read by the Senator from Colorado, is correct in principle, would not the enforcement of the war-time legislation, for instance, the Lever Act and other acts that may occur to the Senator's mind, be illegal? Would not those acts ipso facto cease to exist?

Mr. THOMAS. Necessarily so.

Mr. KING. So that all prosecutions under the Lever Act would be illegal and the decision of the Supreme Court upholding the Lever Act quite recently was erroneous?.

Mr. THOMAS. That is correct. The Senator anticipated me there. I was about to call attention to the fact that the logic of the Senator from Pennsylvania and that of the Supreme Court in the war-time prohibition case were not reconcilable.

Mr. KING. That is true.

Mr. THOMAS. Apart from other considerations involved in that decision, the fact stands out that the conclusion of the court is necessarily and fundamentally based upon the position that we are still in a state of war.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. McCUMBER. I wish to ask the Senator from Colorado if he has heard in any of the prosecutions under war-time acts of a demurrer being filed upon the ground that there was no law to sustain the charge?

Mr. THOMAS. In just one instance I have heard of such a plea, which occurred in my own State in a very peculiar way. A certain department store was about to be investigated by the grand jury for alleged violation of the Lever Act, when a bill was filed before the United States court to enjoin the grand jury from conducting its investigation upon that and other grounds. His honor sustained the application and granted the injunction; but whether upon that ground or not I do not know.

Mr. President, the address delivered yesterday upon the merits of this resolution by the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER], in my judgment, exhausted the subject, as he always does when he considers one from the standpoint of law and Constitution. His logic is inexorable; it is unanswerable; and, in my judgment, it so completely disposes of the legality of this resolution as it stands that I would be imposing myself upon the Senate if I attempted further to elaborate the same proposition. I shall, therefore, as regards this resolution, content myself with the reasons that I have attempted to express and which convince me that it is beyond our power to act upon it.

However, Mr. President, I am constrained before taking my seat to submit to the Senate some observations upon a recent telegram sent by the President of the United States on the 9th day of May to one G. E. Hamaker, of Portland, Oreg. I do so very unwillingly and only in the discharge of what I believe to be an unavoidable personal duty, for the telegram, apart from its immediate purpose, virtually imputes dishonor to every Senator voting against the treaty or for the treaty with reservations. The President says such action is "utterly inconsistent with the Nation's honor and destructive of the world leadership which it had established," and so forth. This telegram, appearing like a bolt from the blue, is addressed to an obscure and unknown individual living in the city of Portland, Oreg., whose chief claim to distinction, I understand, is his animosity to Oregon's great senior Senator [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], and who is now and has been for some time engaged in the effort to procure his defeat for renomination at the primaries on the 21st of May.

With all due respect to the President of the United States, whose leadership I have steadfastly followed whenever I could do so in accord with the dictates of my conscience and my convictions, he might at least have given this document to the world through the medium of the official organization of the national Democracy or of the minority leaders of the Senate or the House. He might at least have selected some prominent and well-known agency for the expression of this opinion, instead of utilizing an obscure individual, living across the continent and evidently caring as little about the treaty as any man in the United States, but perfectly willing to use that or any other weapon for the accomplishment of his political objective.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator refers to this individual as an "obscure" person. I have seen it stated in the public prints that, instead of being obscure, he is the campaign manager of the opponent of the senior Senator from Oregon in the Democratic primaries in that State.

Mr. THOMAS. That should make him very prominent——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I think it will before he gets through.

Mr. THOMAS. Because a Democrat in Oregon who opposes the renomination of the senior Senator from that State deserves the sort of notoriety enjoyed by "the youth who fired the Ephesian dome."

I do not, Mr. President, contend for a moment that this pronunciamento of the Executive was designed to aid the enemies of the senior Senator from Oregon; I do not know as to that; but I feel very sure that it justifies such an impression by anyone who sees fit to entertain it. I so state because the senior Senator from Oregon, as the chairman of the Senate Committee on Military Affairs during the greatest crisis of the world's history, had the misfortune to incur the displeasure of the President, since which time, although I have no knowledge of the facts, their relations have not been as cordial as I wish they might have been.

I do not wonder, Mr. President, that Senator CHAMBERLAIN aroused opposition in the discharge of his duties as chairman of that vastly important committee. From the commencement to the close of his administration he stood for America and devoted his days and his nights, frequently at the expense of his health, to the cause of his country, thereby writing for himself a record which shall endure as long as the people of this Republic entertain sentiments of gratitude and appreciation for the services of their public men. He inevitably incurred animosities, provoked opposition, and aroused the hostility of many people and of many interests, but nothing swerved him from the pathway of his overwhelming duties. I do not hesitate to say that the chairman of that committee contributed as much to the success of American arms, and because of his position, as any of his compatriots. I say that in derogation of no one; but, from the fact that I was a humble member of that committee during the same period, I know that he lived for nothing save the discharge of the duties of his position. He consecrated his physical and mental energies to the great cause of American arms, with a complete disregard of his own personal welfare and his own personal obligations. He made mistakes and many of them, but who does not? He sometimes occupied attitudes and advanced policies which I could not accept, and yet he may have been right and I may have been wrong; but through it all, Mr. President, his ceaseless vigilance and his enduring service have fully justified the confidence of the people of Oregon, consisting of an overwhelming preponderance of political opponents, but who, nevertheless, for the last 20 years, as governor and as Senator, have availed themselves of his services and kept him at the helm of public affairs. I have too much confidence in such a constituency to believe for a moment, now that the war is over and the victory is won, they will retire their great fellow citizen, their eminent statesman, to the shades of private life. He has served them, he has served his country, too well and too long to merit such a fate.

Mr. President, I think what I have said is due to the Senator from Oregon, not because I contend or even insinuate that any presidential attack has been made upon him, but because of the impressions created by the extraordinary circumstances attending this Executive outburst, and which justify some tribute from a man who knows of the labors of one of the most useful Members the Senate ever had.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. JONES of Washington. As a Member on this side of the Chamber, I want to join the Senator from Colorado in his very deserved tribute to the Senator from Oregon; and I want to ask the Senator if, in his opinion, our boys would have been at Chateau-Thierry when they were had it not been for the brave stand of the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. THOMAS. Why, Mr. President, no man who knows the facts can answer that otherwise than in the negative.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I have said many times, and I sincerely believe, that he is more responsible than any other man in this country for having our boys at Chateau-Thierry at the critical time they were there.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I do not wish to be invidious; there is honor enough in this war for all; but those with whom the Senator from Oregon personally cooperated, with whom he was daily thrown into intimate contact, know what the burden of the day was and how heavily responsibility rested upon his shoulders. A man who under all circumstances never lost confidence even in the darkest hour, maintained unfaltering courage, kept forging ahead, and imparting enthusiasm to his associates and inspiring all with the contagion of a splendid example is not the man to be punished after the victory has been won in a country like ours, where genuine service is appreciated, even though not always rewarded.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. THOMAS. I do.

Mr. PHELAN. The value of the services of the Senator from Oregon is so considerable, not only to his country but more particularly to that part of his country which fronts upon the Pacific, that I am sure his colleagues would be loath to lose him as a Member of the Senate.

The Senator from Colorado stated that the President addressed some obscure person "where rolls the Oregon," and he implied that the President might have had in mind some other purpose than that conveyed by the reading of the message—simply a redeclaration of his policy with respect to the so-called Lodge reservations.

Mr. THOMAS. I so stated, Mr. President.

Mr. PHELAN. I should like to add to the discussion, however, the thought that while the President is entitled to his views, the Senate is also, as a coordinate body, entitled to its views. It has not been infrequent for Presidents and other distinguished persons to convey their sentiments in letters addressed to humble persons; but it is not fair to infer that there was any intention on the part of the President, because his correspondent happened to reside in Oregon, to reflect upon the Senator from Oregon. Furthermore, I am informed that the Secretary to the President has disavowed, on behalf of the President, any intention to make such a reflection.

Mr. THOMAS. I do not know whether the disavowal has been made or not, but it ought to be made.

Mr. PHELAN. I am informed that by telephone the President, through his secretary, has disavowed any intention to make any reflection upon the Senator from Oregon, doubtless according him the same right which he claims for himself to express and hold his opinion. Therefore I think it should appear in the RECORD that no antagonism has been shown by the Executive toward the distinguished Senator from Oregon, whose long service in this body has made him invaluable, and whom his colleagues, I believe, desire to see returned.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I have carefully avoided casting any imputation whatever upon the President's motives, but I am not so charitably inclined toward the recipient of the message, and I do not wish to do him injustice. What I say regarding him, however, is based upon assurances coming from gentlemen who, I know, would not misrepresent the facts.

But, Mr. President, while it is true that the Executive is not only entitled to but should be encouraged in expressions of official opinion regarding all matters coming within administrative jurisdiction, and which, I am sorry, have not more frequently characterized the present administration, nevertheless it is our right, when reflections are made upon our official conduct by such declarations, to make fitting reply. Indeed it may be averred that silence under such conditions might well be construed as an acceptance of their truth.

The President says:

I think it imperative that the party should at once proclaim itself the uncompromising champion of the Nation's honor and the advocate of everything that the United States can do in the service of humanity; that it should therefore indorse and support the Versailles treaty and condemn the Lodge reservations as utterly inconsistent with the Nation's honor and destructive of the world leadership which it has established.

I am not concerned with the Lodge reservations, but if they are utterly inconsistent with the Nation's honor, then the rejection of the treaty is more inconsistent with it; and if both are so inconsistent, then every Senator who voted for the Lodge reservations and everyone who voted for the rejection of the treaty comes under the imputation of the President's criticism. In other words, not content with advocating a policy to be followed by his party, the President unfortunately asperses the Members of this body who have been unable to agree with him.

I voted, Mr. President, against ratification of this treaty, and I believe I have familiarized myself as thoroughly with it as any Member of this body. If it ever comes to the Senate again while I am here, my vote will be the same. Outside of the three Democratic malignants, of whom I am, unfortunately, one, 21 of my Democratic associates voted for ratification with reservations, thereby dishonoring the Nation, destroying the hope of the world, and rejecting the greatest document ever submitted to the inspection of mankind. They are Messrs. ASHURST, BECKHAM, CHAMBERLAIN, FLETCHER, GORE, HENDERSON, KENDRICK, KING, MYERS, NUGENT, OWEN, PHELAN, PITTMAN, POMERENE, RANSDELL, SMITH of Georgia, SMITH of Maryland, TRAMMELL, WALSH of Massachusetts, WALSH of Montana, and WOLCOTT. If you add to those the names of the 3 who are totally depraved, we have an aggregate of 24 men on this side of the Chamber who have incurred the censure and bear the reproach of the Chief Magistrate of the United States.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; the Senator is one of them.

Mr. KING. I do not rise for any explanation or any apology. I merely wanted to invite the Senator's attention to the fact that there was a number of Senators who were absent and paired in favor of the reservations.

Mr. THOMAS. Those gentlemen, Mr. President, I shall not add to the list of the banned.

Mr. KING. They will be glad to have their names in the RECORD.

Mr. THOMAS. That may be; but inasmuch as those gentlemen can prove an alibi, if it becomes necessary, I shall not have the temerity to add them to my list.

On the other side of the Chamber are quite a number of gentlemen who have been equally indifferent to their country's honor, but I am inclined to think that they can take care of themselves. Whether they can or not, I am obliged to devote such time as remains to me to my companions in iniquity on this side of the Chamber.

And let me say, Mr. President, that if the Democratic Party next June in San Francisco shall commit itself to the unconditional ratification of the treaty of Versailles, it will write Ichabod above the door of its convention hall, for its glory will have departed.

We had another Democratic President in 1896 who became the whole party before his term expired, and who took occasion to deliver a similar bull of excommunication in 1896, which did not prove wholly disconcerting. We did not bow to the yoke then, but we stood by what we conceived to be a great Democratic principle, incurred Mr. Cleveland's hostility and that of his friends, and went down to defeat and to 16 years of exile. History may repeat itself; but if so, then its warnings are thrown away upon men of the highest intelligence and political experience.

The President says:

Let us prove to our late associates in the war that at any rate the great majority party of the Nation, the party which expresses the true hopes and purposes of the people of the country—

In all of which I agree—intends to keep faith with them in peace as well as in war.

* * * * * * * *

The League of Nations is the hope of the world. As a basis for the armistice, I was authorized by all the great fighting nations to say to the enemy that it was our object in proposing peace to establish a general association of nations under specific covenants for the purpose of affording mutual guaranties of political independence and territorial integrity to great and small states alike, and the covenant of the League of Nations is the deliberate embodiment of that purpose in the treaty of peace.

The chief motives which led us to enter the war will be defeated unless that covenant is ratified and acted upon with vigor. We can not in honor whittle it down or weaken it, as the Republican leaders of the Senate have proposed to do.

I read again:

The true Americanism, the only true Americanism, is that which puts America at the front of free nations and redeems the great promises which we made the world when we entered the war, which was fought not for the advantage of any single nation or group of nations, but for the salvation of all.

If I construe this language correctly, Mr. President, it means that certain promises and pledges were made to all the world by the people of the United States when we entered the war, the redemption of which depended upon victory, and all of which are included in the treaty of Versailles; that we stood pledged in advance to them, and that the rejection of this treaty means their repudiation. This must be the basis of the imputation which this announcement casts upon the honor and the moral integrity of those who declined to vote for the unconditional ratification of the treaty.

Mr. President, that brings me to a necessary consideration of what pledges were made and by whom they were made when we entered the war, and their binding force upon the consciences of the American people, for if we did pledge ourselves to the contents of the pending treaty, then regardless of its consequences we should stand by our agreement and ratify the treaty. But I deny, Mr. President, as earnestly as it is in my power to do so, that any motives save those appearing in the address of the President on the 2d of April, so far as they have been accepted by the Congress, or such as may be found in the legislation of that period, were made or could have been made to the world binding either the representatives of the people or the people themselves, and he who asserts their existence, of course, has the burden of sustaining the charge.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CURTIS in the chair). Does the Senator yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. What has the Senator to say concerning the speech of the President delivered to the joint session of the House and Senate on the 8th of January, 1918, in the midst of the war?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I have this to say, that the pledges to which the Senator must refer, and the pledges to which the President refers, are those which led us to enter the war. He says so in terms.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. This is a speech of the Executive of the United States, who, by the Constitution, is charged with the sole duty of conducting foreign affairs and of initiating peace propositions. He called the House and Senate into session. He laid down certain purposes of the war. Among those was the formation of an association of nations, or league of nations, for the prevention of war in the future. That address was delivered officially. It was delivered to both Houses of Congress. It was received with applause, and not a voice was raised, either in the House of Representatives or in the Senate, in criticism of that pledge of the President for the formation of a league of nations for eight months after it was delivered.

Now, I ask the Senator, under those circumstances, when the constitutional officer of the United States, in the presence of the legislative body, laid that down as one of the objects of the war, had not the world a right to believe that the Nation proposed to live up to it?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I am glad the Senator asked me that question, because I know that he believes and has acted upon the belief that it was his duty to recognize that pledge and to make it effectual in the treaty. But if that particular pledge is binding upon the Senator's conscience, and if he thinks that it should be binding upon my conscience as well, were not the other pledges then made equally binding upon the conscience of the President, and why did he virtually abandon them?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. When the President laid down those purposes for which we were fighting he did not lay them down as the purposes for which our associate nations were fighting, and when he got together with them to agree upon terms of peace and the terms of an armistice he could speak only for the United States. He was bound in the very necessities of the case to make such settlement as he and they could together agree upon. Now, he and they did agree to the terms of this League of Nations, and, as I said, in the United States there was not, officially or otherwise, any protest anywhere from anybody against the formation of a League of Nations for eight months after the President proclaimed it.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the Senator, like the President, has become obsessed with one of 14 points. That one point is so sharp, so prominent, and so persistent that it has impaled them both; they have lost their sense of perspective, the Senator as an able leader of the treaty forces here, the President as the sole actual representative of the people of the United States at Versailles.

These 14 points, Mr. President, have been harped on for a long time; but inasmuch as the question propounded by the Senator deserves consideration, let us see what they are for a moment:

1. Open covenants of peace openly arrived at, after which there shall be no private international understandings of any kind, but diplomacy shall proceed always frankly and in the public view.

There is one of the pledges, if the speech of the 8th of January embodies pledges as the Senator contends, which has not only been forgotten but constantly disregarded. The negotiations were not open; and I do not think they should have been open, let me say, because a public convention of a peace conference in Paris would have been just about as successful as a circus in a Catholic church. Publicity is impossible where the affairs of nations are being considered and agreements are so difficult to arrive at.

After which there shall be no private international understandings of any kind.

Mr. President, the world teemed with private understandings during the period covered by the sessions of the Versailles conference. They have been disclosed here, among others, understanding as to Egypt and Persia, the latter being an especially good illustration, against which no protest was registered, even at Versailles, by the American delegation.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. THOMAS. "But diplomacy shall proceed always frankly and in the public view." I yield.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Suppose the Senator is able to demonstrate that every other one of the 13 points was abandoned by the President; does that prove his statement that there was no pledge for a League of Nations?

Mr. THOMAS. Oh, no; it does not prove that.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Then why take up the time of the Senate to argue it? The Senator made the statement that there has been no pledge for the formation of a League of Nations. I point him to that speech, and, in answer to it, he undertakes to say that other pledges were made and broken. Is that any reason for breaking this one, even admitting that he is correct, which I deny?

Mr. THOMAS. The President uses the plural. It is the Senator from Nebraska who uses the singular. I am not assailed as dishonoring my country and my party because I have declined to vote for a treaty containing a pledge. It is the Senator, and not I, who seeks to confine this entire controversy to one assurance. I contend that the last of these 14 points is no more important than any of the others, and was no more important at the time they were announced; and all of them succeeded our entry into the war.

The second point was:

Absolute freedom of navigation upon the seas, outside territorial waters, alike in peace and in war, except as the seas may be closed, in whole or in part, by international action for the enforcement of international covenants.

That poor pledge went glimmering almost before it was enunciated.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I will yield in just a moment. It was expressly excluded from the note of November 5, 1918, and the President himself said that it did not amount to anything—I do not use his exact language—because it had not occurred to him at the time of its announcement that with a universal league of nations the seas would be free, anyhow. Therefore he turned his back upon this, which, in my judgment, is an essential to the existence and operation of a successful league of nations. Gone? Why, Mr. President, it never came.

I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator claims that there was such a pledge made as he has just recited?

Mr. THOMAS. I am reading from the speech to which the Senator called my attention.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Then he, of course, admits that this pledge was made for a league of nations, which before that he denied.

Mr. THOMAS. I have not denied it at all. I have said it was not proclaimed before our entry into the war.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I understood the Senator did deny it before I rose to interrogate him.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator did not ask that question.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. He denied that the United States was ever pledged to a league of nations.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator asked me if I regarded the President's speech of January 8 as constituting a pledge of America to the Allies for the war. My reply was that I regarded these pledges, if any, which were made at the time of our entrance into the war, as showing the purposes for which we entered it, and to which the President's last announcement expressly referred.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. But now I understand the Senator asserts that this pledge which he has mentioned was a pledge. If that was a pledge, then this one referred to by the President was a pledge. I should like the Senator to say specifically whether he now admits that the United States was pledged?

Mr. THOMAS. No; I do not.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Then the Senator comes back to his original position, and I ask him how he can otherwise interpret the President's speech, delivered officially in the presence of the Senate and the House, and which went without any question for eight months? If that was not a pledge, what is a pledge?

Mr. THOMAS. Is the Senator through?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Temporarily. I thank the Senator.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator is now so far through that I can answer him. The Senator asserts that the League of Nations' point as one of the 14 points was a pledge of this Nation to a League of Nations and that I have admitted it; that it is a pledge because it was applauded when it was received and was not questioned for some eight months. If that constitutes a pledge, then everything that the President said on every occasion during the war was a pledge, because it was always applauded and nobody objected at the time. Certainly the Senator will not contend that every time the President opened his lips during the war and spoke upon a subject he pledged, or had authority to pledge, the people of the United States to something which they are in honor bound to incorporate in a subsequent treaty of peace.

I say, in answer to the Senator's question, that that is a pledge only in the sense that the other 13 are pledges, and no more; and that neither he nor anyone else is justified in exalting one of the 14 points out of all proportion to the others. The Scriptures tell us that Aaron's rod was once turned into a serpent, and other rods as well. Whereupon the serpent from Aaron's rod swallowed all the others. This ceremonial is dwarfed into insignificance by the Senator's contention. This fourteenth point has assumed all the proportions of Aaron's rod to those who justify the President's last fulmination.

But I proceed:

The removal, so far as possible, of all economic barriers and the establishment of an equality of trading conditions among all the nations consenting to the peace and associating themselves for its maintenance.

Is that a pledge? If so, show me where it is covered in this treaty. I recall that the President on the 27th of September said that it would be an insincere and an insecure peace which did not do away with all these commercial rivalries which are the fruitful sources of the plans and purposes of war; and a more solemn truth never fell from human lips. Make all the leagues you please and they will shrivel into nothingness so long as trade wars may continue in the world, a fact which the President perceived and expressed far more eloquently than can I. But this fundamental condition, this pledge, as the Senator from Nebraska would call it, received no consideration, so far as we are able to determine, no consideration whatever, at Versailles. Was the honor of the Nation thereby tarnished?

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I dislike to interrupt the Senator, but I can not refrain from asking him if, when he compared the 14 points to Aaron's rod, he intended to suggest that they were a serpent?

Mr. THOMAS. Oh, no; I only compared one of them to that rod and I would not even pretend that that was a serpent. The Senator from Nebraska, however, endowed it with a similar swallowing capacity.

Adequate guaranties given and taken that national armaments will be reduced to the lowest point consistent with domestic safety.

Does any such guaranty appear in the treaty? What has become of it? We do consent that the league, when once established, shall make recommendations on the subject. But armaments, both by land and sea, are increasing progressively, and, if I understand the situation the world over, its people were never so belligerent as they have been since the cessation of hostilities. Half a dozen wars are now in prosecution; turbulence, vindictiveness, animosities, and antagonisms characterize humankind everywhere, both in their foreign relations and particularly within their domestic affairs. For that I blame no one. It is the inevitable consequence of the greatest conflict in which humanity was ever engaged. But it ill comports with an enduring peace.

I will take another:

A free, open minded, and absolutely impartial adjustment of all colonial claims, based upon a strict observance of the principle that in determining all such questions of sovereignty the interests of the populations concerned must have equal weight with the equitable claims of the Government whose title is to be determined.

There is another noble sentiment comprised within the purview of the 14 points. Has there been even a pretense at free or an open minded or an absolutely impartial adjustment of all colonial claims? Why, Mr. President, the treaty sweeps every colony from Germany and turns them over to France and Great Britain without saying "by your leave" to a single resident.

That in determining all such questions of sovereignty the interests of the populations concerned must have equal weight with the equitable claims of the Government whose title is to be determined.

Was Shantung disposed of under this fifth point or pledge? Was the population concerned consulted at all? Is not Austria forbidden, regardless of the wishes of her people, to merge with Germany? Has not the Saar Valley and its people been torn from the side of Germany almost at the same time that the demand for self-determination in Fiume was pressed to the limit?

I shall not discuss Shantung. It has been overdiscussed heretofore. I am unable to say just how the final arrangement was made which gave it to Japan, but as long ago as last September my attention was called to an article in the magazine called Asia upon that subject, written by Mr. Patrick Gallagher, well known as a correspondent on far eastern affairs. After returning from a prolonged residence in the Philippines and China, he became associated with the Far Eastern Bureau in New York City. He attended the peace conference to report the eastern angle of the discussion, and since his return has affiliated himself with the Far Eastern Syndicate, with headquarters in Washington. In the September number of the journal called Asia Mr. Gallagher contributes an article entitled "Marquis Saionji moves," which will be found beginning on page 894 of the magazine. I am constrained, in connection with the fifth point, to read the closing column and a half of the article, and I invite the interested attention of my auditors to it.

The British and the French and the Japanese delegations listened to Mr. Wilson—

This is regarding Shantung—

And then they talked these matters over among themselves; and they came to the conclusion that our delegation was not very learned or very practical, at the top, in the matter of the Chinese question. They decided that among themselves they could play ball, good, profitable ball, and they played it. Now, it is curious that upon droll circumstances great historic happenings are ofttimes built. I am afraid that I have been very serious, very dreary, in trying to unravel for the readers of Asia the tangled skein of the Paris conference. So let us all laugh, as the Japanese laughed on the night of April 30.

On the forenoon of April 24 a young Japanese newspaper man of no importance (and with less knowledge of what was actually happening at Japanese headquarters, the Hotel Bristol, than some of his American confrères) happened into 4 Place de la Concorde and whispered the news to one of the most admittedly brilliant American special correspondents, "The Japanese delegation is packing up." The great American reporter whisked his Japanese friend away from the press-room, and together they hurried to the Hotel Bristol, where, surely enough, they found boxes and boxes, and more boxes, and trunks, and trunks, and more trunks, piled one upon the other, in the hotel courtyard. Moving silently and stealthily, like melodramatic villains, the representatives of East and West fourth estate sallied forth once more. This time their destination was the Hotel Meurice, where Marquis Saionji, Baron Makino, and Mr. Ijuin had their suites. Again Japanese trunks and more trunks; Japanese boxes and more boxes; great crates of the Marquis's favorite fish plucked from the placid waters of Lake Chusendji, and dried according to a special and ancient recipe; handsome steamer trunks with brass and rawhide knobs; trunks to the right and trunks to the left; and bellhops and valets scurrying hither and yon. The bright reporters rushed to the Bourse, and the news was flashed all over the world that the Japanese delegation was packing up; that Mr. Ijuin, the Japanese Ambassador at Rome, had called upon Baron Sonnino, the Italian Foreign Minister, and pledged Japan's support to the Italian Adriatic position; that the conference was collapsing, because Wilson would not give Italy Fiume, or Japan Kiaochow, or acknowledge the racial and national equality of the Japanese.

Within the same hour Mr. Odagiri, the famous Japanese banker, mentioned casually to Mr. Thomas W. Lamont that there was more than one side to the Chinese financial consortium plans being pushed by the American Government, and that it would be difficult for the Japanese to come in if Japan should leave the peace conference defeated on all points. Upon the same day Lord Robert Cecil told Col. House that, while Baron Makino was loyally eager to aid a League of Nations, it was becoming increasingly difficult to assure Japanese support on account of the general attitude of the conference toward Japan. A few minutes later Col. House learned about the trunks, and the boxes, and the expected exodus of the Japanese delegation from Paris. He got in touch with the President at once. Somebody confirmed the wild rumors. The President immediately reversed himself in the matter of Kiaochow, shut himself away from his far eastern advisers and the Chinese, and assented to Baron Makino's solution. I am in a position to know that the Japanese conceded nothing, nor did they bargain their racial amendment for the Shantung articles. They won upon their own terms and upon facts. Mr. Wilson lost all the tricks upon silly gossip.

The trunks and boxes at the Hotel Bristol and the Hotel Meurice were piled one upon the other in preparation for transfer to the magnificent villa at 50 Rue de Bassano, that had just been leased for the Marquis Saionji. The Marquis was not moving out. He was moving in.

Mr. President, I do not, of course, confirm the truth of that report, but it has never been denied. If it be true that the fundamental question underlying the Shantung situation was solved upon the outward appearance of a possible exodus from Paris of the Japanese delegation, in God's name how can we accept the assurances that we have received about this treaty being the embodiment of pledges which have been made and which we can not with honor reject?

My friend from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] has left the Chamber. Hence I shall not burden those who remain to hear me upon the remaining nine points of the celebrated fourteen. They have been put in the RECORD so frequently that I hesitate to act upon the suggestion of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], but I again assert that if these be the pledges to which the President referred in his recent letter, then surely I may be pardoned if I exercise my individual right as a Senator of the United States to judge upon the merits of the question myself when I discover that but one of all the pledges then given has been embodied in the treaty, and that at the expense of concessions which not only ignore but frequently contradict the terms of the other thirteen.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not think the Senator from Colorado understood the Senator from Nebraska, who, as it seemed to me, claimed that it was necessary in the dickering over there to abandon 13 points in order to prevent getting dishonored by abandoning the fourteenth.

Mr. THOMAS. Probably not. The suggestion is one, however, which I will leave to the consideration of the Senator from Nebraska. It is nevertheless very certain that vital requirements were yielded for the sake of securing some sort of a league.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. REED. Assuming, now, that the mere fact that the President of the United States prepared a speech one day and said that he favored 14 different propositions constituted a contract on the part of this Nation if it were accepted, did the Senator from Colorado ever hear of one party to a contract which contained 14 provisions being bound by the acceptance of the other party, when the other party repudiated thirteen-fourteenths of the document and only accepted one proposition that he liked?

Mr. THOMAS. I never heard that until now; but we are living in new and strange times.

Mr. REED. Did the Senator from Colorado ever before hear of the proposition that the 110,000,000 people of the United States should be bound in international matters of the most solemn character by the mere fact that the individual who happens to be President made a speech of a certain character? Did he ever hear that doctrine until within the last three or four months?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I can readily conceive that the Chief Executive of the Nation can, as its spokesman, commit the country to a great many things. I would not feel justified in saying that I never before heard of such things, but I am unwilling to admit the proposition that a war was entered into upon so-called pledges made some six or eight months after it began.

Mr. REED. Did the Senator ever know of an autocratic government that went further than to follow the doctrine that when the king uttered a decree it bound the people?

Mr. THOMAS. Oh, yes; the king——

Mr. REED. Did the Senator ever hear of an autocratic government going further than that?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; I have, although that is going pretty far.

Mr. REED. I should like to be informed of an instance where an autocratic government went further than that.

Mr. THOMAS. Oh, Mr. President, absolute despotisms can do anything, and we have had them in the world for centuries.

Mr. REED. Exactly. But did the Senator ever hear of an absolute despotism that could go further than to hold that the mere word of the despot became binding upon all the people?

Mr. THOMAS. Oh, no; not unless it was accepted or acquiesced in by the people.

Now, Mr. President, just a word upon the causes of this war. Every people in deliberately entering upon a great conflict enjoy a spiritual exaltation. It is a melancholy reflection upon our poor human nature that the sentiment of fraternity and brotherhood is more active in times of bloody conflict than in times of peace and quiet, where good will is supposed to be the ruling sentiment of communities. So in declaring our purpose in this war, under the influence of that psychological faculty which unites races and peoples in times of peril, and which stimulates them to sacrifice in the defense of the assertion of a common cause, we declaimed in lofty eloquence our lofty motives. Germany and Austria spoke the same language; indeed, one of them proclaimed under the same influences that hers was a war for defense of home and fireside, for the spread of culture among the nations of the earth, for their uplift, their civilization, and their permanent well-being.

Congressmen on the floor of the Senate and on the floor of the House, the President, and public speakers at great meetings called to support and sustain the Government—all of them pivoted their action in the supreme crisis upon the highest attributes of human nature, upon the loftiest of human purposes, and in many instances correctly; yet, Mr. President, if we really entered the war to make the world safe for democracy, if we entered the war for the destruction of the last vestiges of autocratic despotism, if we entered the war prompted by all the impelling forces of international altruism, then we should have entered it the moment the first German soldier crossed the boundaries of Belgium; then we should have declared war against Germany on the night of the day of the sinking of the Lusitania; then we should have entered it the moment the first stages of the submarine warfare were authorized; then we should have entered it as soon as we perceived—and we very soon did perceive—the existence of German intrigue and domestic interference throughout the land designed to destroy our neutrality and to compel our identification with the great European struggle. But we did not take immediate action; we waited until the month of February, 1917, when the war was two and a half years old, after oceans of blood had been spilled and billions of treasure had been wasted, and then we acted. Why? Because our citizens were murdered upon the high seas; because their property was ruthlessly destroyed; because our rights upon the ocean, the great highway of all the nations, were violated not only once but many times, and with an impunity which subjected us to the reproach of cowardice. Only then did the German ambassador receive his passports. The President of the United States, among other things in his message to the joint session of the 2d of April, truly said:

> We enter this war only where we are clearly forced into it because there are no other means of defending our rights.

That was eternally true. We went into the war because we could not help ourselves. If our rights had not been invaded we never should have entered it; we would have permitted it to be waged to its bloody finish, and Germany to-day, in consequence, would be the master of the Eastern Hemisphere, if not of the world.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Instead of entering the war on broad principles of altruism and of service to humanity, were we not mouth after month alleged to be waiting for the Germans to perform an overt act against us? Was not that the daily suggestion in the newspapers that at last, perhaps, an overt act would be committed?

Mr. THOMAS. That is absolutely true. It was the attitude of my party, whose declarations at St. Louis were to that effect, and while in connection therewith we announced our purposes and our lofty intentions toward all the world, including our enemies, the fact remains that the people of the United States responded to the war because of the outrages inflicted upon their fellow citizens, which demonstrated the need for war if we were to preserve our country from a foreign invader, sure to come, once he had broken down the barriers of an intervening ocean.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. REED. In this connection I should like to call the Senator's attention to the language of the President himself in his message of the 3d of February, 1917. It will be remembered that Germany had served notice that she proposed to renew her submarine warfare. The President came before the Congress, and, after having given an epitome of the correspondence and of the facts, stated this:

> Notwithstanding this unexpected action of the German Government, this sudden and deeply deplorable renunciation of its assurances, given this Government at one of the most critical moments of tension in the relations of the two Governments, I refuse to believe that it is the intention of the German authorities to do in fact what they have warned us they will feel at liberty to do. I can not bring myself to believe that they will indeed pay no regard to the ancient friendship between their people and our own or to the solemn obligations which have been exchanged between them and destroy American ships and take the lives of American citizens in the willful prosecution of the ruthless naval program they have announced their intention to adopt. Only actual overt acts on their part can make me believe it even now.

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; that is in keeping with the extract which I read from the message of April 2.

On the 9th of May the President said, among other things:

> I was authorized by all the great fighting nations to say to the enemy that it was our object in proposing peace to establish a general association of nations under specific covenants for the purpose of affording mutual guarantees of political independence and territorial integrity to great and small States alike, and the covenant of the League of Nations is the deliberate embodiment of that purpose in the treaty of peace.

Mr. President, that is true, but it is not all of the truth. The President was authorized by the Allies to speak for them as well as for himself, not only regarding this covenant, but regarding all other terms embodied in the correspondence between the German Government and the President, beginning early in October and culminating with the German note of November 7. I affirm, because it is demonstrable from the treaty, that the terms outlined in the President's letter of November 5, which included many other things than this association and which were pledges or contracts equal to that of the league, have not been kept with Germany, but were largely disregarded, at least with the tacit consent, certainly without the opposition, of the American delegation at Versailles.

Let me read the letter of November 5 upon this subject:

> In my note of October 23, 1918, I advised you that the President had transmitted his correspondence with the German authorities to the Governments with which the Government of the United States is associated as a belligerent, with the suggestion that if those Governments were disposed to effect peace upon the terms and principles indicated their military advisers and the military advisers of the United States be asked to submit to the Governments associated against Germany the necessary terms of such armistice as would fully protect the interests of the peoples involved and insure to the associated Governments the unrestricted power to safeguard and enforce the details of the peace to which the German Government had agreed, provided they deemed such an armistice possible from the military point of view.
> The President is now in receipt of a memorandum of observations by the allied Governments on this correspondence, which is as follows:
> "The allied Governments have given careful consideration to the correspondence which has passed between the President of the United States and the German Government. Subject to the qualifications which follow, they declare their willingness to make peace with the Government of Germany on the terms of peace laid down in the President's address to Congress of January, 1918, and the principles of settlement enunciated in his subsequent addresses. They must point out, however, that clause 2, relating to what is usually described as the freedom of the seas, is open to various interpretations, some of which they could not accept. They must, therefore, reserve to themselves complete freedom on this subject when they enter the peace conference.
> "Further, in the conditions of peace laid down in his address to Congress of January 8, 1918, the President declared that invaded territories must be restored as well as evacuated and freed, and the allied Governments feel that no doubt ought to be allowed to exist as to what this provision implies. By it they understand that compensation will be made by Germany for all damage done to the civilian population of the Allies and their property by the aggression of Germany by land, by sea, and from the air."

Mr. President, that proposal was accepted. Its meaning is perfectly clear, that compensation will be confined to damage done the civilian population of the Allies and their property by German aggression, and it was an enlargement of one of the President's 14 points relating to the subject. When this treaty was made, however, notwithstanding this solemn pledge of the United States and the other allies, this restriction was thrown to the winds and Germany compelled to agree to make reparation not only for the elements to which it was limited but for all pensions and separation allowances of the Allies everywhere, including ourselves.

The President has said, and said very truly, that we wanted no indemnities in this war; that we would ask for no reparation. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] cited a long list of benefits and advantages that we have secured, and which are property rights. He did not elaborate the point which I am considering, but to which he referred.

In annex 1 of article 244 of the treaty, among other things cited as damage caused to the peoples of the allied and associated powers and for which compensation must be made, are:

All pensions and compensation in the nature of pensions to naval and military victims of war (including members of the air force), whether mutilated, wounded, sick, or invalided, and to the dependents of such victims, the amount due to the allied and associated Governments being calculated for each of them as being the capitalised cost of such pensions and compensation at the date of the coming into force of the present treaty on the basis of the scales in force in France at such date.

The cost of assistance by the Governments of the allied and associated powers to prisoners of war and to their families and dependents.

Allowances by the Governments of the allied and associated powers to the families and dependents of mobilized persons or persons serving with the forces, the amount due to them for each calendar year in which hostilities occurred being calculated for each Government on the basis of the average scale for such payments in force in France during that year.

Mr. President, the German representatives protested against these items. They appealed to the agreement of November 5, which they had accepted, and to the definition placed upon the President's point regarding indemnity as it appeared specifically in his letter of November 5, but all in vain. They were compelled, under duress, to accept these terms without regard to the original contract.

It may be, Mr. President, that they should have been required to do so; but that is not the point. If we are sacredly to observe pledges made to our allies during the war, and if Senators dishonor themselves when they fail to accept the President's interpretation of them, it is equally evident that pledges made by all the Allies to the enemy, and constituting the basis of the armistice, are in honor binding upon them. The amount which Germany will be required to pay in consequence of this disregard of the preliminary agreement, embracing pensions and separation allowances to all nations, including our own, can not well be comprehended by the finite mind. It gives to the United States of America, if we saw fit to insist upon it, the right to require Germany to pay every pension and every separation allowance that we made in consequence of the war, or that we may be required to make hereafter—a sum reaching into untold billions; a sum which no nation in the world, not even our own, could ever pay; a sum imposed upon a defeated nation in direct contradiction to a solemn pledge given to it in advance of the capitulation.

Mr. President, if I am dishonored because I am unable to accept this treaty, what shall be said of the official delegation of the United States which threw to the winds a solemn international understanding and, with its heel upon the prostrate form of the vanquished enemy, demands his last drop of blood and exacts it in the teeth of a solemn covenant?

Mr. President, I might extend this discussion indefinitely if it were necessary to vindicate the position which my associates and I have taken regarding this very solemn subject, but I do not think that by doing so I could add to the strength of what has been said. I wish, however, before taking my seat to refer to what may be called the aftermath of this treaty and which should impress upon us the importance of full and complete information as to what was done and what was agreed to be done by the President and his associates in order to secure his League of Nations before we yield to his requirements. I do not know. Time will tell. Time has already revealed some very important situations coming from a very high source. My own conviction is that the President was so obsessed with the one thing which had taken control of his intellect and his emotions and which had become the sine qua non of his existence—the League of Nations—that he was prepared to make any sacrifice seemingly indispensable to securing his beloved league in some shape to bring across the waters and lay before the Senate for ratification.

One of the greatest of modern Frenchmen is André Tardieu. Save only Clemenceau, he was the most prominent French figure at the Versailles conference. He occupied a commanding position during the war, and that required his presence in America on several occasions. He was present at nearly all of the meetings of the so-called Big Four, and constantly in the confidence and the counsels of Clemenceau.

On the 19th of March, the day of the rejection of the treaty, Tardieu, in an article contributed to a Paris paper, said that Wilson planned to aid world finance and agreed that the league should be the agency for stability; and this has never been contradicted, because it can not be. It is as nearly authoritative as any official declaration of the conference itself. The article reads:

That President Wilson agreed to the principle that the League of Nations should be the agency for the establishment and maintenance of world financial stability as well as world political stability, and that the treaty once ratified he planned a campaign to advocate these conditions, is asserted by André Tardieu in an article he has written for L'Illustration.

M. Tardieu's declaration is interesting in view of the present financial situation. He argues that had it not been for the turn that political events took in America and for the President's illness France might to-day be in a better economic situation.

M. Tardieu's statement appears at the end of a long article arguing against revision of the treaty. He contends that the trouble is not with the treaty but with lack of solidarity among the Allies.

"Here is the great gap, and it is not in the treaty itself," he writes. "The treaty regulates only relations between Germany and the Allies. But peace, like war, has to be organized. It is only too clear that responsibility for the present situation grows out of events in Washington. Already, in the month of February, M. Clemenceau and his collaborators posed this vital financial question. Not without difficulty they had accepted the principle of a financial League of Nations. In June President Wilson, with his counsellor, Mr. Lamont—

We all know who Mr. Lamont is, the head of the house of Morgan—

"studied a plan of solidarity for which, after the treaty was ratified, he intended to make a campaign through the United States. Political fights and his sickness have ruled otherwise. Nothing has been done, and France at the hour I write finds her only guaranties in the treaty itself."

Mr. President, we can only conjecture what that means. It is of vastly significant importance. It clearly indicates that the President proposed to make a campaign in favor of the project. I think, therefore, it is perfectly within bounds to assume that its meaning is a plan for the consolidation or merger of all the debts of the Allies with the credit of the Allies and of the United States behind the mass. I know that about this time, or very shortly before, various communications appeared in the public press, evidently inspired, urging a merger of the debts of France and England, of the United States and Italy, into a common pool, and, of course, for the protection of those owning the securities. Is it possible, Mr. President, that our delegation, in order to secure the so-called league, were required to consent tentatively to a financial plan that could be made effective only through a presidential campaign throughout the country? Of course, it goes without saying that such a plan would be impossible without the sanction of Congress. But that very fact explains the need for the campaign.

Let me go a step further. Five days afterwards M. Tardieu contributed another article to the same paper, in which he said that Wilson gave a Rhine guaranty and that it might prolong the French occupation beyond 1935; that Clemenceau exacted it and obtained it as a resource in case the Senate rejected the alliance plan. This is dated Paris, March 24, and reads:

André Tardieu, who was a member of the French peace commission, says that in April, 1919, President Wilson agreed with Premier Clemenceau that in the event of the nonratification of the Franco-American military treaty France should be entitled to indefinite occupation of the Rhine.

Mr. President, that is a tremendous statement. The President of the United States, according to this eminent Frenchman, negotiated a treaty of alliance between England, France, and the United States, which France thought should supplement the League of Nations, and which I think is still before this body for consideration, a treaty which requires us to go to the aid of France if at any time within its life hostilities between Germany and that Republic shall occur; and in the event of its nonratification here, then the President agrees that France shall be given indefinite occupation of all that part of Germany which lies to the west of the Rhine. That, again, Mr. President, requires for its validity the concurrence of the Senate and a treaty arrangement. But the people of the United States ought to understand that scores of consequences may inevitably result from the ratification of this treaty, which at present we can only conjecture.

Tardieu has spoken twice. In one instance he tells us that financial solidarity will follow the political solidarity created by the league; in the next, that if the Senate rejects this treaty of alliance—which I am sure they will, and which I know they should—then France may indefinitely occupy all of Germany west of the Rhine.

Mr. President, how will that situation comport with a permanent and enduring peace? How will that situation comport with the self-determination of peoples? Where in all history has the territory of a great people been indefinitely occupied by the military power of an enemy which did not result in certain and inevitable war? It is the due, and has been the due, of the Senate ever since this measure came before it for consideration to receive every possible item of information concerning it, every agreement or understanding, conditional or otherwise, accompanying it, every concession considered concerning it, or they should continue to refuse its ratification.

One more reference, Mr. President, and I am through. I hold in my hand a clipping from an article entitled "Poland," from the pen of Kenneth L. Roberts, in the Saturday Evening Post of April 17, 1920. It is a long and highly illuminating article, evidently written from personal knowledge, and gives an impartial but graphic account of political and industrial conditions in that new country. The article reads:

Poland is in a generous state of flux. Her boundaries are particularly fluxish, especially the boundaries which face Russia and the Bolsheviks. The peace conference has carefully refrained from defining these boundaries, so that nobody is able to come within 300 miles of locating them with any accuracy.

Think of a treaty, Mr. President, designed to subserve an enduring peace for all mankind which leaves the boundaries of new countries anywhere within a radius of 300 miles, among peoples whose racial differences have been the fruitful cause of many wars, and whose thirst for dominion will inevitably impel each and all of them to claim this disputed region.

The article continues:

They have been left as hazy and indistinct as a kerosene lamp in a London fog and offer remarkably fine grounds for future wars. The peace conference failed in many notable respects, but it was a complete success at providing every country in central Europe with boundaries to fight over. I might add that there are very few countries which will fail to take advantage of the opportunities with which the peace conference has so generously provided them. That, at least, is the opinion of every American military man and every American observer that I met in central Europe—and they are the only disinterested and impartial people to be found in that large and troubled stretch of territory. Everybody else has an ax to grind. Some have only one ax in need of grinding, but most of them have as many axes awaiting the sharpener as a stage magician has rolls of colored paper which he produces to mystify his audience.

And the United States seems to have been unanimously elected to the position of official ax grinder. To change the simile a trifle, if the United States joins with her well-known heartiness in the League of Nations she will be the energetic member who will be expected to remove the chestnuts from the fire. She will have to be the one who will have to endure the curses of those who are impatiently awaiting the chestnuts, as well as the one who will have to apply the salve to the burns on her fingers.

The intensity with which Americans in central Europe mention the League of Nations is truly passionate. They usually lead off in the same way. "When I came over here," says each one of them, "I was all for the League of Nations. But I've changed now; believe me, I've changed! Let them sign the peace treaty as soon as they can, but for the love of Mike don't let them get mixed up with the League of Nations! If they want to fight, and we tell them not to fight, do you think they'll stop? Not so that you could notice it! Help them, because they need help; but stay out of the league!" And so they run on, from morning to night and through most of the night as well, whenever they can find a warm room in which to sit.

Mr. President, the conditions of central and Balkan Europe are such, and made worse by the treaty, that conflict and collision, controversy and bloodshed, are inevitable, not only in one but in almost every section of that unhappy country, and largely the result of this treaty confusion in boundaries.

As this correspondent says, if they want to fight—and they do—how can we stop them? There is just one way. We can mobilize another expeditionary force; we can take the young man of America away from the bosom of his family; we can transport him four or five thousand miles across the sea; we can place him in the trenches of central and eastern Europe, and the people will foot the bill. We will do it, not once but many times. We will do it so long as these conditions exist, and when you consider that the League of Nations can not be amended except by unanimous consent, that means that they will exist permanently.

And yet Senators of the United States, sworn to support the Constitution of the United States and to execute the laws, endowed by that Constitution with a portion of the treaty-making power, are charged with dishonorable conduct because, forsooth, they have hesitated to accept this league as written.

Mr. President, I resent the imputation, and I decline to act in obedience to any command which is not in harmony with my own conscience and my own convictions of public duty. I am prepared to take every consequence which the power, either of the Executive or the people, may see fit to visit upon my devoted head, but I want, every time I look in the mirror, to greet a face of which I am not ashamed. No question of expediency or of partisanship can in the slightest degree influence my conduct in considering a great document freighted with the destinies of the people of the world through all the tides of time.

I protest against making this mighty question the sport of party politics. I have striven to the best of my ability to divorce the subject from every political consideration except those of the highest and most universal character. And no man, however exalted, can fetter the limbs of my party, and, with a rope around its neck, drag it, unresisting and unprotesting, to the fate of a certain dissolution.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I wish to give notice that on the convening of the Senate to-morrow at 12 o'clock, with the permission of the Senate, I shall submit some remarks upon the pending joint resolution.

NATIONAL PROHIBITION.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the complaint and briefs in the case of the State of New Jersey testing the legality of the eighteenth amendment and the so-called Volstead Act. I do not make the request from the standpoint of the merits of the question of prohibition or antiprohibition, but it is such a clear and conclusive review of the doctrine of State rights that I believe as a historical document the public should have an opportunity to read it.

These briefs differ from others printed in the RECORD on the same subject, inasmuch as this is a case brought by a sovereign State through its attorney general and is distinct from a suit representing a private individual. The question of prohibition is only incidental to the principle of State rights involved.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ASHURST in the chair). The Senator from New Jersey asks unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the briefs which he has indicated. Is there objection? There being no objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

"SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES.

"October Term, 1919. No. 30. Original.

"[State of New Jersey, Complainant, v. A. Mitchell Palmer, Attorney General, and Daniel C. Roper, Commissioner of Internal Revenue, Defendants.]

"SUPPLEMENTAL BRIEF OF COMPLAINANT ON THE POWER TO AMEND UNDER ARTICLE V.

"The Colonies under the Government of England had law-making rights, which were stated by Edmund Burke in his classic speech, asking for conciliation with the Colonies. His fourth resolution was:

"'Each of the Colonies have within themselves a body chosen in part or in the whole by the freeman, freeholders, or other free inhabitants thereof, commonly called the General Assembly or the General Court, with powers legally to raise, levy, and assess, according to the several usages of such Colonies, duties and taxes toward defraying all sorts of public services.' (J. Dodsley, London, 1775, p. 45.)

"The distinction between the powers of the British sovereign and the legislative powers of the Colonies marks the original distinction between National Government and local government. As the King of England had authority to govern in affairs of national and foreign nature, so the Colonies, by their assemblies, had the authority to govern in their internal affairs, commonly designated as powers of economy and police.

"When the Colonies became independent States, Congress exercised the national powers which had formerly attached to the British sovereign, and the various independent States retained the powers of economy and police. When the Constitution was made effective and the Union was established, the National Government was exercised and has since been exercised under the powers enumerated in the Constitution, and such national powers not enumerated in the Constitution of constructive nature were still in the people of the United States, as distinguished from the people of the States by reason of the diversity of the citizenship.

"Mr. Patterson, of New Jersey, who was associated with Mr. Witherspoon in the Constitutional Convention, afterwards one of the justices of this court, passed upon the matter of a prize taken at sea, before the Constitution became effective, and when the States were acting nationally under the Articles of Confederation. Concerning the powers of Congress at that time, in reaching his conclusions in the case, he said (Penhalow v. Doane, 3 Dall. 54, p. 80):

"'Much has been said respecting the powers of Congress * * *. To determine what their powers were we must inquire what powers they exercised. Congress raised armies, fitted out a Navy and prescribed rules for their government; Congress conducted all military operations, both by land and sea; Congress emitted bills of credit; received and sent ambassadors and made treaties; Congress commissioned privateers to cruise against the enemy, directed what vessels should be liable to capture, and prescribed rules for the distribution of prizes. These high acts of sovereignty were submitted to, acquiesced in and approved by the people of America.'

"These were the powers of the people of the United States as distinguished from the powers of the respective States because the high acts of sovereignty so exercised by Congress were, as he stated, submitted to, acquiesced in, and approved by the people.

"The powers in the people of the United States as distinguished from those in the States or in the National Government are very clearly stated in Tucker's Blackstone Appendix, page 303:

"'To comprehend the full scope and effect of the tenth article, by which certain rights are said to be reserved to the States, respectively, or to the people, it is to be recollected that there are powers, exercised by most other Governments which in the United States are withheld by the people, both from the Federal Government and from the State governments; for instance, a tax on exports can be laid by no constitutional authority whatever, whether of the United States or of any State; no bill of attainder or ex post facto law can be passed by either; no title of nobility can be granted by either. Many other powers of government are neither delegated to the Federal Government, nor prohibited to the States, either by Federal or State Constitutions. These belong to that indefinite class of powers which are supposed necessarily to devolve upon every Government, in consequence of the very act of its establishment, where no restrictions are imposed on the exercise of them * * *.'

"In discussing the powers of the Government of the United States as distinguished from those still in the people of the United States and those reserved to the respective States, Mr. Justice Brewer, in Kansas v. Colorado (206 U. S., 46, pp. 89-90), said:

"'The proposition that there are legislative powers affecting the Nation as a whole, which belong to, although not expressed in the grant of powers, is in direct conflict with the doctrine that this is a Government of enumerated powers. That this is such a Government clearly appears from the Constitution, independently of the amendments, for otherwise there would be an instrument granting certain specific things made operative to grant other and distinct things. This natural construction of the original body of the Constitution is made absolutely certain by the tenth amendment. This amendment, which was seemingly adopted with prescience of just such contention as the present, disclosed the widespread fear that the National Government might, under the pressure of a supposed general welfare, attempt to exercise powers which had not been granted. With equal determination the framers intended that no such assumption should ever find justification in the organic act, and that if in the future further powers seemed necessary, they should be granted by the people in the manner that had been provided for amending that act. * * * The argument of counsel ignores the principal faction in the article, to wit, "the people." Its principal purpose was not the distribution of power between the United States and the States, but a reservation to the people of all powers not granted. The preamble of the Constitution declares who framed it, "we the people of the United States," not the people of one State but the people of all the States, and Article X reserves to the people of all the States the powers not delegated to the United States. The powers affecting the internal affairs of the States, not granted to the United States by the Constitution nor prohibited by it to the States are reserved to the States, respectively, and all powers of a national character which are not delegated to the National Government by the Constitution are reserved to the people of the United States. The people who adopted the Constitution knew that in the nature of things they could not foresee all the questions which might arise in the future, all the circumstances which might call for the exercise of further national powers than those granted to the United States, and after making provision for an amendment to the Constitution by which any needed additional powers would be granted, they reserved to themselves all powers not so delegated. This Article X is not to be shorn of its meaning by any narrow or technical construction but is to be considered fairly and liberally so as to give effect to its scope and meaning.'

"See also earlier opinion by the same distinguished jurist to the same effect in the case of Turner v. William (194 U. S., p. 295).

"Mr. Justice Moody, in Twining v. State of New Jersey (211 U. S., p. 97), further enumerated the rights and privileges of national citizenship as the right to pass freely from State to State, the right to petition Congress for the redress of grievances, the right to vote for national officers, the right to enter the public lands, the right to be protected against violence while in the lawful custody of a United States marshal, and the right to inform the United States authorities of violations of its laws.

"The true situation was very clearly stated, as above set forth, in the same case (p. 97), where Mr. Justice Moody said, referring to Mr. Justice Miller's opinion in the Slaughterhouse cases:

"'The fourteenth amendment * * * removed the doubt whether there could be a citizenship of the United States independent of the citizenship of the State by recognizing or creating and defining the former.'

"He quoted:

"'It is quite clear, then, that there is a citizenship of the United States and a citizenship of the State, which are distinct from each other, and which depend upon different characteristics or circumstances in the individual.'

"He said further:

"'The description of the privileges and immunities of State citizenship, given by Mr. Justice Washington, in Corfield v. Coryell (4 Wash. C. C., 371), is then quoted (by Mr. Justice Miller), page 76, said to include: "Those rights which are fundamental," to embrace "nearly every civil right for the establishment and protection of which organized government is instituted" and "to be the class of rights which the State governments were created to establish and secure." This part of the opinion (of Mr. Justice Miller) then concludes with the holding that the rights relied upon in the case are those which belong to the citizens of States, as such, and are under the sole care and protection of the State governments.'

"Mr. Justice Moody continued (p. 97) to the effect that the fundamental rights of State citizens are inherent in State citizenship, that this right is a privilege or immunity of that citizenship only and distinguished from the rights of United States citizenship by saying:

"'Privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States, on the other hand, are only such as arise out of the nature and essential character of the National Government, or are specifically granted or secured to all citizens or persons by the Constitution of the United States,' citing Slaughterhouse cases (16 Wall., 36, 79); In re Kemmler (136 U. S., 436, 448); Duncan v. Missouri (152 U. S., 377, 382).

"In the succinct words of the third paragraph of the syllabus of the Twining case:

"'There is a citizenship of the United States and a citizenship of the State which are distinct from each other (Slaughterhouse cases, 16 Wall., 36); and privileges and immunities, although fundamental, which do not arise out of the nature and character of the National Government, or are not specifically protected by the Federal Constitution, are attributes of State, and not of national, citizenship.'

"In conclusion, it is clear that the right to amend the Constitution of the United States in the manner provided in Article V, by either method, is a right incident to the powers of the citizens of the United States as distinguished from the right of the citizens of the respective States; that no amendment may be made to the Constitution of the United States not of right belonging to the citizenship of the United States; that all powers not enumerated in the Constitution and not of right appertaining to the citizenship of the United States, are reserved to the respective States under Article X, which are the internal police powers of the States, and among such powers, it is settled, is the right to legislate concerning the manufacture, use, and sale intrastate of intoxicating liquors; that, therefore, the sumptuary law, now attempted to be incorporated as a fundamental law in the Constitution of the United States, is invalid because not granted by those in whom the right existed.

"SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES.

"October term, 1919. No. 30. Original.

"[State of New Jersey, Complainant, v. A. Mitchell Palmer, Attorney General, and Daniel C. Roper, Commissioner of Internal Revenue, defendants.]

"BRIEF OF COMPLAINANT ON MOTION TO DISMISS.

"STATEMENT OF THE CASE.

"The State of New Jersey having been granted leave to file its bill of complaint herein, a motion has been made on behalf of the defendants asking that said bill of complaint be dismissed upon the allegations that the matters and things set forth therein present nothing justiciable in their nature nor within the jurisdiction of this court and, further, that there is no equity in said bill of complaint and that the facts stated therein present no cause of action against the defendants.

"The bill of complaint on which this honorable court on this motion is asked to pass is filed by the State of New Jersey as one of the States of the United States and on behalf of its people and prays that a writ of injunction issue against the defendants named therein for the purpose of restraining them from enforcing within its territorial jurisdiction the provisions of Title II of an act of the Sixty-sixth Congress of the United States, designated as the national-prohibition act, which is intended to enforce the so-called eighteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

"As averred in the bill of complaint, these defendants, if permitted to enforce this act of Congress within the State, will override and destroy the inalienable rights of the State of New Jersey and of its people to control the internal affairs of the State and will cause pecuniary loss to the State and affect the public health and welfare.

"The complainant bases its right to relief upon the following grounds:

"That acting under the provision of Article V of the Constitution and by virtue thereof, two-thirds of the Houses of Congress may not propose and three-fourths of the 'legislatures' of the several States may not ratify, without the consent of New Jersey, any change in the Constitution of the United States in the form and to the extent purported to have been done in the case of the so-called eighteenth amendment.

"That the so-called eighteenth amendment was not adopted in the manner provided in Article V of the Constitution, either with respect to the action of the Houses of Congress in proposing the said amendment or with respect to the action of three-fourths of the several States in ratifying same.

"That the national prohibition act is void in that it was enacted under the provisions of the so-called eighteenth amendment. That said defendants, acting under the authority of said void act of Congress, threaten to interfere with and are interfering with the State of New Jersey in the enforcement of its laws having for their object the regulation of the traffic in intoxicating liquor.

"That if the said eighteenth amendment be held to be a valid amendment to the Constitution, then, it is contended by complainant, that under section 2 thereof the State has exclusive power to enforce within the territorial limits of New Jersey in intrastate commerce the provision of section 1 of said amendment, and that it has been interfered with in the exercise of this power and of its laws by defendants' action in threatening to enforce the national prohibition act within the State of New Jersey.

"That if the eighteenth amendment be a valid amendment, and if Congress has a right to legislate in a manner binding upon the State of New Jersey in its internal affairs, then the complainant contends that the national prohibition act is not appropriate legislation under said amendment.

"I. THE CONSTITUTION IN ITS RELATION TO THIS CONTROVERSY.

"A. The nature of the Constitution.

"'What is a constitution? It is the form of government denoted by the mighty hand of the people in which certain first principles of fundamental law are established. The Constitution is certain and fixed.' (Van Horn v. Dorrance, 2 Dallas, 304, 308.)

"'Constitutions should consist only of general provisions; the reason is that they must necessarily be permanent and that they can not calculate for the possible change of things.' (Mr. Hamilton in the New York Convention, Elliott's Deb., vol. 2, p. 364.)

"'At this late date it ought not to be necessary to repeat that the object of the framers of that instrument was to lay the foundations of the Government, to set up its framework, and to establish merely the general principles by which it was to be animated; avoiding, as far as possible, any but the most fundamental regulations for controlling its operations.' (Mr. Justice Pitney in Southern Pacific Co. v. Jensen, 244 U. S., 205, 227.)

"'That the framers of the Constitution did not intend to restrain the States in the regulation of their civil institutions, adopted for internal government, and that the instrument they have given us is not to be so construed, may be admitted.' (Dartmouth College v. Woodward, 4 Wheat., p. 629.)

"'The maintenance of the authority of the States over matters purely local is as essential to the preservation of our institutions as is the conservation of the supremacy of the Federal power in all matters entrusted to the Nation by the Federal Constitution. In interpreting the Constitution it must never be forgotten that the Nation is made up of States to which are entrusted the powers of local government, and to them and to the people the powers not expressly delegated to the National Government are reserved. (Lane Co. v. Oregon, 7 Wall., 71, 76.) The power of the States to regulate their purely internal affairs by such laws as seem wise to the local authority is inherent and has never been surrendered to the general Government. (Slaughterhouse cases, 16 Wall., 36, 63; Kidd v. Pierson, 128 U. S., 1, 21; Hammer v. Dagenhart, 247 U. S., 275, 276.)

"'The framers of the Constitution unquestionably had no other intent in the formation of the instrument than to incorporate therein the fundamental, permanent law for the guidance of government, rather than to make it an instrument usable for legislative purposes in the sense of formation of municipal law.' (Slaughterhouse cases, 16 Wall., 63.)

"'The original and supreme will organizes the Government and assigns to different departments their respective powers. It may either stop here or establish certain limits not to be transcended by those departments. The Government of the United States is of the latter description. The powers of the legislature are defined and limited, and that those limits may not be mistaken or forgotten the Constitution is written.' (Marbury v. Madison, 1 Cranch., 137.)

"'The genius and character of the whole Government seems to be that its action is to be applied to all the external concerns of the Nation and to those internal concerns which affect the States generally, but not to those which are completely within a particular State.' (Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat., 195.)

"The powers granted to the Government of the United States under the Constitution are enumerated therein. It is a Government of limited, delegated powers, and has no powers other than those delegated and such as arise by necessary implication from such delegation.

"B. The relation of the State of New Jersey to the Federal Government under the Constitution.

"The prerogatives and powers of New Jersey during the colonial period, the declarations of the first and second Continental Congresses, in which conventions representatives of New Jersey participated, the adoption of her first constitution, July 2, 1776, suitable to her needs and uses as a free and independent State, and the subsequent acknowledgment of her freedom and independence by the treaty of Paris, September 3, 1783, are detailed in the bill of complaint (Art. IV).

"The Articles of Confederation, signed July 9, 1778, constituted a league of friendship among the American States for the better security of their liberties. Under these articles New Jersey did not yield, surrender, or delegate any legislative power over its internal affairs—economy and police or of intrastate commerce—and by Article II thereof it was expressly provided that each State retain its sovereign freedom and independence and every power, jurisdiction, and right not expressly delegated to the United States in Congress assembled, and further, by Article XIII, provided: 'Nor shall any alteration at any time hereafter be made in any of them' (i. e., of the articles), 'unless such alterations be agreed to in the Congress of the United States and afterwards confirmed by the legislatures of every State.'

"The Constitution became effective by the ratification of the ninth State on June 21, 1788. The National Government, which at that time came into existence, comprised, however, only nine States. The people of the State of New Jersey, as the third ratifying State, so acted in good faith and with full assurance that only such portion of sovereign power was relinquished by them as was necessary and essential to the creation and establishment of a limited national government for the purposes and with the powers enumerated in the several articles of the Constitution, and that nothing might be the subject of an amendment under Article V thereof, except matter dealing with the structure and form of the said limited national government, and that nothing might thereafter be the subject of an amendment which by the nature thereof would tend, ultimately, to the destruction either of the said limited national government or of the several States.

"II. THE POWER TO AMEND THE CONSTITUTION UNDER ARTICLE V.

"A. Limitations upon the amending power.

"The framers of the Constitution never intended that the instrument should be of an immutably permanent and abiding nature. They therefore inserted in the Constitution Article V, providing a method by which amendments to that instrument might be made. Such amendments should be germane to the scope of the original instrument; of a character consonant with the idea of government rather than of direct legislation. In other words, it should be of such a nature that the scope of the power originally delegated would be in no wise altered.

"'That useful alterations will be suggested by experience could not but be foreseen. It was requisite, therefore, that a mode for introducing them should be provided. The mode preferred by the convention (Article V) seems to be stamped with every mark of propriety. * * * It, moreover, equally enables the General and the State governments to originate the amendment of errors, as they may be pointed out by the experience on one side or the other.' (Federalist, 43, pp. 338, 346.)

"'The term "amendment" implies such an addition or change within the lines of the original instrument as will effect an improvement or better carry out the purpose for which it was framed.' (Livermore v. Waite, 102 Cal., 113, 118, 119.)

"'The power to amend, too, must not be confounded with the power to create. The difference between creating and amending a record is analogous to that between the construction and repair of a piece of personal property.' (Gagnon v. United States, 193 U. S., p. 457.)

"The fifth article was, therefore, inserted in the Constitution for the purpose of making such necessary and needful changes as experience should demonstrate for the carrying on of the limited National Government created under the Constitution. The ordinary and natural meaning of the terms used in the fifth article and the purpose to be accomplished limit the authority granted by the article to matters germane—changes in the distribution and regulation of governmental powers. All grants of power are necessarily limited by the nature of the subject matter to which they relate. This is what confines the exercise of the judicial power to questions which are in their nature justiciable and is what confines the exercise of the taxing power to things which in the nature of our dual government are subject to taxation.

"The fact that the phrase concerning the internal police of the States was omitted and that the phrase that no State should be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate was included is not an argument to the effect that it was intended thereby to be so read as to permit an amendment to the Constitution tending or effectuating the destruction of the internal police powers of complainant. As Mr. Madison said at that time, 'to begin with these special provisos, and every State will insist on them for their boundaries, exports, etc.' (Madison's Notes, Farrand, vol. 2, pp. 629–631.)

"This court has repeatedly held and it is settled that the police power is the power of State government, without which the excuse for the existence of the States composing the Union would be done away with. (Texas v. White, 7 Wall., 700.)

"The ninth and tenth amendments, declaratory of the Constitution itself, fixed the reserved rights of the States. The words 'reserved to the respective States or the people,' it is settled, refers to the police power. In this connection reference is made to the remarks of Mr. George T. Curtis in his Constitution of the United States, volume 1, pages 160–161. The ninth and tenth amendments are exceptions or provisos to each article in the Constitution, no less so to the fifth article than to any other article. The article in question should be considered as if those amendments had been written therein.

"'We know of no rule,' said Chief Justice Marshall in Gibbons against Ogden, Ninth Wheaton, page 1, in discussing the powers granted to the General Government under the Constitution, 'for construing the extent of such powers other than is given by the language of that instrument which confers them, taken in connection with the purposes for which they were conferred.'

"B. The meaning of the word 'amendment.'

"Article 13 of the confederation, as previously observed, provided that no alteration might be made except as confirmed by the legislatures of every State. In the convention which subsequently formulated the Constitution, the word 'amendment' was used advisedly rather than the words 'alter,' 'change,' 'diminish,' 'abolish,' 'add,' 'explain,' or 'revise,' which are words that an inspection of the various constitutions then in existence show to have been in use at that time. Such words are of different or of broader meaning than the word 'amendment.' The word 'amendment' implies a change which is closely related to the subject matter of the instrument.

"In the Passenger cases (7 How., 283, 453) Mr. Justice McKinley said that the acknowledged accuracy of the language and clearness of diction in the Constitution would seem to forbid the imputation of so gross an error to the distinguished authors of that instrument in the confounding of such words or the employment of them indiscriminately.

"It is very significant that the word alteration as used in the Articles of Confederation, in referring to changes in that instrument which were required by it to be made only upon the consent of all the States, was not used in the Constitution in Article V, with reference to such changes as might be permitted. It is settled that the framers of the Constitution used with great nicety words to express the exact meaning intended by them, and the fact that the Constitution may be amended without the consent of the people themselves in convention, but may be made merely by their agents, as proposed by Congress and ratified by three-fourths of the States, as was done in the present instance, or by conventions in three-fourths of the States only and not by all the people, shows clearly that the use of the word 'amendment' did not grant in such method to those having the power of amendment the right to make such alterations which would be equivalent to the creative power used in the original construction of the instrument, but rather that the word 'amendment' has an exact limited and defined meaning.

"Mr. Chief Justice Taney, in the Passenger cases (supra, p. 493), said: 'Everyone will admit that a construction which suggests a word of larger meaning than the word used in the Constitution could not be justified or defended upon any principle of judicial authority.'

"Reference to the earlier dictionaries which were in existence at the time of the use of the word in Article V clearly demonstrates that it was used in the signification of the correction of an error and the substitution of something better of the same nature. The power granted was for the purpose of preventing the defeat of the original provision in case the governmental power granted was found to be defective. Mr. Chief Justice Taney in the same opinion said: 'The members of the convention unquestionably used the words they inserted in the Constitution in the same sense in which they used them in their debates."

"In the proceedings of the Continental Congress new matter not amendatory was referred to as a proposition under 'color of amendment,' and throughout the debates all new matter under the rules which was submitted and not amendatory of the proposition under discussion could not be discussed without a postponement of the matter in hand, for the reason that it was not, in fact, an amendment of the proposition under discussion, but new or creative matter under color of an amendment. (Hinds' Precedents, secs. 5753–5767.)

"The defense of Article V in the Federalist exhibits the same view of the character of an amendment. 'For my part,' said Mr. Hamilton, 'I acknowledge a thorough conviction that any amendments, which may upon mature consideration, be thought useful, will be applicable to the organization of the Government, not to the mass of its powers.' (The Federalist, No. 85, p. 551.)

"C. The alternative method of amendment under Article V.

"There are two methods prescribed in Article V for amending the Constitution. One, whenever two-thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary Congress shall propose amendments, or, upon the application of the legislatures of two-thirds of the several States, shall call a convention for proposing amendments, which, in either case, shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of the Constitution when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States or by conventions in three-fourths thereof, as the one or the other mode of ratification may be proposed by the Congress.

"Though there may be no objection in principle to an amendment which concerns the right of suffrage, an example of the effect of ratification by the legislatures rather than by the people in convention assembled, is suggested in that New Jersey has twice, by popular vote, refused to amend its constitution to permit female suffrage, yet at the present session of its legislature a proposal of an amendment to the Constitution of the United States was ratified which, by way of illustration, may be fairly indicative of what we may expect in the future.

"The construction of the words of Article V, in the light of the ninth and tenth amendments, indicates that the conferred power to amend by the agents of the people, viz, Congress and the legislatures, is only such as permits of a change in the subject matter of the Constitution as is germane thereto, that no other powers than those originally granted may be incorporated among the enumerated powers as has been hereinabove set forth.

"The fact that no power to make changes, other than in structural, governmental matters, is implied in the amending article under the doctrine that special powers conferred on agents limits them to matters germane to the grant. Therefore, the idea that amendments, purely legislative, though national in scope, may be made by the agents of the people, rather than by the people themselves, is denied, because the power was never delegated to such agents. If, however, this court shall conclude that Article V indicates a method of alteration by way of incorporating in the fundamental law such legislative matter which restricts the people in their habits of life, heretofore exclusively a State function under the police power, it, nevertheless, is clear, it is submitted that such a revolutionary proceeding may only take place by the action of the people assembled in convention, as in the first instance, when the Constitution was originated, though acting under the amending clause by the affirmative vote of three-fourths of the respective States. 'The assent of the States, in their sovereign capacity, is implied in calling a convention and thus submitting that instrument. It required not the affirmance, and could not be negatived, by the State governments.' (McCulloch v. Md., 4 Wheat., 316, 404.)

"Both the Federal and State Governments, as stated by Mr. Madison in the Federalist, are 'but different agents and trustees of the people, constituted with different powers and designated for different purposes' (than are their agents in convention assembled delegated to form a constitution).

"In Lane County v. Oregon (7 Wall., 71, 76) Mr. Chief Justice Chase said: 'Both the States and the United States existed before the Constitution. The people, through that instrument, established a more perfect union by substituting a National Government acting with ample power directly upon the citizens, instead of the confederate government which acted with powers, greatly restricted, only upon the States. But in many articles of the Constitution the necessary assistance of the States, and, within their proper spheres, the independent authority of the States, is distinctly recognized. To them nearly the whole charge of internal regulation is committed or left; to them and to the people all powers, not expressly delegated to the National Government, are reserved.'

"If any part of this reserved power may be delegated by amendment of the Constitution to the National Government, it must have been the intent of the people, if there was any such intent at all, that such alteration should only be made by the calling, through Congress, of conventions for ratification in three-fourths of the several States. The alternative method for ratification, incorporated in the article, must be used in such a case if such legislative matter can possibly be incorporated in the Constitution at all.

"It is elsewhere noted that the Houses of Congress were asked to make the alleged proposal to amend in the present case not because they deemed the amendment necessary but because they should not stand in the way of ratification by the legislatures. It will also be observed that the proposal in the words of the resolution was made to the 'States' instead of to the respective 'legislatures,' contrary to the practice heretofore followed, indicating that in the minds of the proposers the idea was more or less consciously present that in this case the subject matter was sufficiently revolutionary to require ratification by the people in their sovereign capacity, rather than by the legislatures to whom such a power was never originally delegated and which is not now at their disposal.

"'In any event, there can be no loss (by amendment) of separate and independent autonomy to the States through their union under the Constitution, but may it not be unreservedly said that the preservation of the States and the maintenance of their governments are as much within the design and care of the Constitution as the preservation of the Union and the maintenance of the National Government? The Constitution in all its provisions looks to an indestructible Union, composed of indestructible States.' (Texas v. White, 7 Wall., 725.)

"D. The so-called eighteenth amendment is legislative in nature and revolutionary in character, and, therefore, improper under Article V.

"The distinction between an amendment to a constitution and lawmaking power under a constitution is well recognized. The power to amend the Constitution of the United States and the manner in which that power shall be exercised is clearly set forth in Article V. The delegation of legislative power to the Congress is specifically provided for in Article I. The functions of each are separate and distinct.

"The distinction between an amendment to the Constitution and the lawmaking power under a constitution is well stated by the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, passing upon the question as to whether the amendment provision in the constitution of that State called for submission to the governor of resolutions passed under it. The court said: 'It is also necessary to bear in mind the character of the work for which it provides. It is constitution making; it is a concentration of all the power of the people in establishing organic law for the Commonwealth, for it is provided by the article that "if such amendment or amendments shall be approved by a majority of those voting thereon, such amendment or amendments shall be a part of the constitution." It is not lawmaking, which is a distinct and separate function, but it is a specific exercise of the power of a people to make its constitution.' (Commonwealth v. Griest, 196 Penn. St., 396, 404.)

"The Constitution of the United States, in Article I, provides 'All legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives.' The grant of power is exclusive. There is no other legislative power granted under the Constitution.

"Legislative power is the exercise by the lawmaking body of the right to make rules and regulations for the conduct of persons subject thereto, in the interest of the whole nation, and necessarily implies the right of the majority to change the rules of conduct so established. It deals, generally, with the safety, health, morals, welfare, and general conduct of the community as distinguished from the form of government raised up by the people. Constitutions define the form of government, legislatures prescribe the rule of conduct for the individual. The so-called eighteenth amendment is legislative, not constitutional, matter, and, therefore, could not be enacted under Article V, whatever might be said of the right to delegate to Congress the power to enact legislation, under Article I, which would be changeable by the will of the majority at any time. The distinction between fundamental and legislative power is thus clear and explicit.

"Mr. Jameson, in his work on Constitutional Conventions, fourth edition, section 85, defines the difference between fundamental laws and ordinary municipal laws, the latter said to be enactments and rules for the government of civil conduct, while fundamental laws, rather, are expressions of the sovereign will in relation to the structure of the government, the extent and distribution of its powers, the modes and principles of its operation, and the apparatus of checks and balances proper to insure its integrity and continued existence.

"This court, in discussing the necessary and proper powers delegated to Congress by the Constitution, comments upon the distinction between the fundamental provisions contained in the Constitution and mere legislation, to the effect that to give to the latter the immutable character of fundamental law would be contrary to the purposes of the founders of our National Government. This provision is made in a Constitution intended to endure for ages to come, and consequently to be adapted to the various crises of human affairs, should not be of such a nature as is comprehended within the character and property of a legal code. (McCulloch v. Md., 4 Wheat., 415.) Such is the nature of the prohibition contained in the so-called eighteenth amendment.

"President Wilson, in his work 'The State,' published in 1895, comments on the distinction between the fundamental law and legislation, and the practice of incorporating in State constitutions legislative matter, as well as fundamental law, and further distinguishes such practice from that followed in the construction of the Federal Constitution. He says:

"'894. Nonconstitutional provisions in State constitutions.—One of the most characteristic features of our State law is the threatened loss of all real distinction between constitutional and ordinary law. Constitutions are, of course, advertised by their name to be bodies of law by which government is constituted, by which, that is, government is given its organization and functions. Private law, the regulation of the relations of citizens to each other in their private capacities, does not fall within their legitimate province. This principle is fully recognized in the construction of our Federal Constitution, which is strong and flexible chiefly because of its great, its admirable simplicity and its strictly constitutional scope. But constitution making in the States, especially in the newer States, has proceeded upon no such idea. Not only do the constitutions of the States go very much more into detail in their prescriptions touching the organization of the Government, they go far beyond organic provisions and undertake the ordinary, but very different, work of legislative enactment. They commonly embody regulations, for example, with reference to the management of State property, such as canals and roads, and for the detailed administration of the State debt; they determine the amounts and sorts of property which are to be exempt from seizure for private debt; they formulate sumptuary laws, such as those forbidding the sale of intoxicating liquors; at a score of points they enter without hesitation or misgiving the field usually reserved for the action of legislative bodies.'

"'896. The objections to the practice are as obvious as they are weighty. General outlines of organization, such as the Constitution of the United States contains, may be made to stand without essential alteration for long periods together; but in proportion as constitutions make provision for interests whose aspects must change from time to time with changing circumstances they enter the domain of such law as must be subject to constant modification and adaptation. Not only must the distinctions between constitutional and ordinary law hitherto recognized and valued tend to be fatally obscured, but the much to be desired stability of constitutional provisions must in great part be sacrificed. Those constitutions which contain the largest amount of extraneous matter, which does not concern at all the structure or functions of government, but only private or particular interests, must of course, however carefully drawn, prove subject to most frequent change. In some of our States, accordingly, constitutions have been as often changed as important statutes. The danger is that constitution making will become with us only a cumbrous mode of legislation.

"'This court, so far as its function required, has always held, with a steady and an even hand, the balance between State and Federal power, and we trust that such may continue to be the history of its relation to that subject so long as it shall have duties to perform which demand of it a construction of the Constitution, or of any of its parts.' (Slaughterhouse cases, 83 U. S. 36.)

"As was said in Hammer v. Dagenhart (247 U. S., 251, 274, 275), citing the Dartmouth College case (4 Wheat., 518, 629): 'The framers of the Constitution did not intend to restrain the States in the regulation of their civil institutions adopted for internal government, and that the instrument they have given us is not to be so construed may be admitted.'

"In South Carolina v. United States (190 U. S., p. 448), it was said: 'There are certain matters over which the National Government has absolute control and no action of the State can interfere therewith, and there are others in which the State is supreme, and in respect to them the National Government is powerless. To preserve the even balance between these two Governments and hold each in its separate sphere is the peculiar duty of all courts, preeminently of this, a duty ofttimes of great delicacy and difficulty.'

"The so-called eighteenth amendment is revolutionary in character and marks a departure from the well-established distinction between constitutional and legislative matter, as well as that it interferes with the police powers of the States and the right to regulate their internal affairs. The serious consequences, which will flow from a proposal such as is contained in the so-called eighteenth amendment prompts us to use the language employed by Mr. Justice Miller in the Slaughterhouse cases (16 Wall., p. 78): 'These consequences are so serious, so far-reaching and pervading, so great a departure from the structure and spirit of our institutions the effect is to fetter and degrade the State governments by subjecting them to the control of Congress in the exercise of a power heretofore universally conceded to them of the most ordinary and fundamental character; when, in fact, it radically changes the whole theory of the relations of the State and Federal Governments to each other and of both these Governments to the people.'

"III. THE SO-CALLED EIGHTEENTH ARTICLE OF AMENDMENT WAS NOT CONSTITUTIONALLY PROPOSED.

"A. The proposal is subject to judicial review.

"In supporting the argument of complainant that the amendment was not constitutionally proposed, the question arises whether the proposal as made by both Houses is subject to review as a judicial question in this court.

"It is true that in Field v. Clark (143 U. S., p. 649) this court held that an act of Congress is complete and unimpeachable when the enrolled bill, signed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives and by the President of the Senate in open session receives the approval of the President and is deposited in the Department of State.

"Mr. Justice Harlan, speaking for the court, recited at length (pp. 673–674), the reasoning of Chief Justice Beasley in the case of Pangborn v. Young, reported in 32 New Jersey law, 29, 30, that upon grounds of public policy, as well as upon the ancient and well-settled rules of law, such a bill could not be contradicted by legislative journals or in any other mode, citing cases. That case and cases of like nature have to do with the question of the accuracy of the prescribed method having been followed.

"The present situation is quite dissimilar in that it is alleged that the proposal has not been made as the Constitution directs; that it is a matter of substantive law and not a mere matter of accurate procedure.

"The same chief justice cited authoritatively in the case of Field v. Clark, supra, said in State v. Rogers (27 Vroom, 480, 616), speaking for the Supreme Court of New Jersey in a case which involved the question as to which body was a valid State senate, that in an inquiry whether the legislature or any other body or officer has violated the regulations of the Constitution: 'It is entirely plain that the decision of that subject must rest exclusively with the judicial department of the Government.'

"In Bott v. Secretary of State (63 N. J. Law, pp. 289, 294, etc.) the court of errors and appeals, in an opinion by Mr. Justice Dixon, quoted from opinions of various State courts, including the Rogers case, to the effect that amendments not made in accordance with rules prescribed by the fundamental law are subject to review judicially.

"The allegation in the bill presents in the first instance difficulty by reason of the fact that precedent, judicial and practical, confronts us. This court, however, has not hesitated in certain instances to declare the correct principle upon the discovery of error in previous adjudications or in practice, though long continued, when convinced that the question involved unforeseen difficulties at the time that the erroneous conclusion was originally promulgated or practiced. One of the leading cases is that of Genesee Chief v. Fitzhugh (12 Howard, 443), where Chief Justice Taney said (p. 456) that the question erroneously decided in the case of The Thomas Jefferson (10 Wheaton, 428) at the later time presented difficulties which could not have been foreseen at the time of the rendering of the erroneous decision, and reversed that case.

"In the Legal Tender cases (12 Wall., 457) this court overruled the earlier decision in Hepburn v. Griswold (8 Wall., 603), where the court said that in a case of far-reaching consequences rather than in cases of private right it is not unprecedented, both in this country and in England, to overrule decisions previously made.

"Counsel therefore approaches this subject with confidence that the court will open its mind to the presentation of that which in the premises appears to counsel to be worthy of the most serious reconsideration in view of the momentous ultimate difficulties which may arise and have arisen in this case by reason of what seems to complainant to be an erroneous practice and annunciation of principle on the question of the constitutional method of proposing amendments under Article V.

"B. Congress did not, by two-thirds in number of both Houses, affirmatively vote for the proposal of the resolution.

"Article I, section 7, paragraph 3, provides that every resolution to which the concurrence of the Senate and House of Representatives may be necessary (except on the question of adjournment) shall be presented to the President of the United States, and before the same shall take effect shall be approved by him, or, being disapproved by him, shall be repassed by two-thirds of the Senate and House of Representatives, according to the rules and limitations prescribed in the case of a bill.

"In the case of Hollingsworth v. Virginia (3 Dallas, 378) this court, in 1798, held that a resolution under the fifth article need not be signed by the President, as every other resolution (except on the question of adjournment) is required to be signed by him, for the reason that the same vote is required to repass it over his veto as would be required in the first instance—that is, by two-thirds of both Houses—and this practice has been continuously followed since that time.

"It will be observed that all resolutions except those proposing amendments to the Constitution and those having to do with adjournments are differentiated in class since that time.

"Constitutional proposals, not being subject to the signature of the President, are therefore exceptions to the provisions of the third paragraph of section 7, Article I, namely: That such a resolution is to be passed by two-thirds of the Senate and House of Representatives, according to the rules and limitations prescribed in case of a bill, nor is such a proposal, when properly carried out in accordance with the Constitution, an act done in a legislative sense, since it is not required to be enacted as other bills are required to be.

"Section 5 of the first article, paragraph 1, provides that the majority of each House shall constitute a quorum to do business. It is manifest that, if all the Members of each House attend and vote on the passing of a bill, that a majority is necessary for the purpose, and the deduction is warranted, therefore, that the Constitution, in providing that it shall be a majority which shall constitute a quorum to do business, provided for a quorum on that basis, the phrase 'doing business' also meaning the carrying on of legislative matter conducive to the enactment of laws under such rules and regulations as may have been enacted by the body in question for the purpose.

"The Constitution, by the fifth article, provides that whenever two-thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary to propose amendments to the Constitution in the required alternative followed in the present instance it is manifest that the business of both Houses is not the same business for which either House of Congress, separately organized, operates in the passage of laws. In one case 'doing business' is passing legislative acts in the shape of municipal law; in the other the performance is an act not legislative and not carried out in the form of legislation, but the making of a proposal deemed necessary to effectuate a change in the fundamental law.

"The Constitution does not prescribe what constitutes a quorum of both Houses in the passage of a concurrent resolution proposing an amendment. Can it be presumed that a quorum, as provided in the Constitution for the enactment of a law, which requires only a majority of all the Members to pass bills is sufficient in the case of a proposal to amend the Constitution, if voted upon affirmatively by less than two-thirds of the membership of both Houses, when there is no constitutional requirement as to the necessary number to constitute a quorum to do such high and solemn business? It is submitted that if the Constitution had provided, in Article V, that two-thirds of both Houses should constitute a quorum that it might then be reasonable to assume that a two-thirds vote of such quorum would constitute the necessary vote to make a valid constitutional proposal of this nature; but, in the absence of such constitutional limit as to a quorum, can it be assumed that the Constitution, as originally drafted, should be construed to permit action in the absence and the affirmative vote of the required number, as contained in the article, namely, two-thirds of the membership of both Houses rather than by two-thirds of a majority necessary to do ordinary legislative business?

"Complainant's contention is that the Congress, in making such proposal, acts as the agent of the people of the United States, and as such the individual Members of both Houses constitute their agents in the necessary proposal, and no vote of less than two-thirds of both Houses, complete in number in the absence of a provision as to the number required to constitute a quorum, should be considered a valid action.

"In the case of Missouri Pacific Railway v. Kansas (248 U. S., 276) the court held, in an opinion by Mr. Chief Justice White, that the vote of two-thirds of each House to pass a bill over a veto means two-thirds of a quorum of each House, which would be two-thirds of a majority of its Members and not two-thirds of all the Members of the body, in which decision, on page 281, it is said that there is an identity between the provision of Article V of the Constitution as to the amending power as to the two-thirds vote in the submission of proposals and the requirements as to the two-thirds vote necessary to override a veto, making the practice of the one applicable to the other. It is submitted that as the question of the amendment of the Constitution was not before the court in that case, the conclusion arrived at in that instance was not necessarily consequent upon the reference by way of comparison to the amending clause to the Constitution; such a statement in the opinion was dictum and is not a precedent binding on this court.

"It is therefore submitted that as the full number of both Houses amounted to 529 Members, and two-thirds thereof to 353 Members, and but 329 Members voted affirmatively, it was not affirmatively resolved by two-thirds of both Houses in number as is required by the Constitution, and that, therefore, the alleged article of amendment is not a part of the Constitution of the United States and is invalid.

"C. The proposal does not, on its face, disclose that both Houses deemed the amendment necessary.

"The first 10 amendments to the Constitution were proposed by a preamble, which recited that two-thirds of both Houses deemed it necessary that the following articles be proposed to the legislatures of the several States, and so forth. The resolution as originally written (see Annals of Congress, Gales & Seaton Ed. of 1834, vol. 1, 777) did not recite that the amendments were deemed necessary. The resolution was amended by the committee to which it was referred, including the essential clause (see Annals of Congress, Gales & Seaton Ed. of 1834, vol. 1, 780-88; 5 Hinds' Precedents, section 7029, p. 1011, note 2). The erroneous form of proposal which has been since followed appears in the Statutes at Large of the United States, published subsequently to the publication above referred to (by Messrs. Little & Brown, in 1845, p. 97). Subsequently amendments to the Constitution were proposed following the erroneous form, stating merely that both Houses concurred in the amendment, rather than that two-thirds of both Houses deemed it necessary.

"It appears from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 56, part 1, pages 5644 and 434, as well as by such record in volume 52, part 6, page 65, Appendix, and also by the report of the House committee of the Sixty-fifth Congress, second session, 211, part 1, December 14, 1917, pages 1 and 2, that Members of Congress did not vote upon the proposition upon the basis of the necessity as to the national prohibition contained in the proposal, but passed it on to the legislatures of the respective States upon the theory that it was not becoming in the Members of both Houses to refrain from making such proposal in view of the demand upon them. Their judgment was not exercised to the effect that prohibition was necessary or that the proposal thereof for the purpose of bringing about prohibition in the manner provided in the so-called article was essential.

"In the passage of a constitutional amendment by the people of a State, the ratification by the people of the proposal of the legislature in a State is accomplished by means of the secret ballot. Each and every elector is enabled to exercise his prerogative of suffrage on the business in hand and without subjection to influence or pressure from his neighbor. Not so the Members of both Houses of Congress in the proposal of a constitutional amendment or the passage of a law, and it seems that the framers of the Constitution of the United States in drafting the clause, incorporating almost irrevocable provisions in the fundamental law, realized the necessity of protecting the Representatives to the extent of requiring that they should go on record as deeming the subject matter of the proposal to be necessary, and not that they should merely acquiesce in the proposal of the article advocated, for the purpose of its submission to the legislatures, in order that they might indicate that they individually were not avowed exponents and protectors of the 'liquor traffic.'

"The question of the traffic in liquor is capable of legislative correction and has been in the process of such correction for years, and is not itself necessarily a vital part in any sense of the fundamental law.

"This court is not asked to pass upon the policy of Congress in proposing the amendment, but is asked to declare the proposal invalid, because no discretion within the meaning of the Constitution has been exercised by those who proposed it, as appears on the face of the so-called eighteenth article. The provisions of the Constitution are mandatory and are subject to observance in detail according to its words in the fifth article, and the question as to whether that article has been complied with is clearly one for the determination of this court for the protection in the future of the citizens of the United States, and, indeed, of the respective States, for this court will, undoubtedly, take judicial notice of the fact that it has become a simpler method to propose and ratify an amendment to the Constitution in the manner in which the so-called eighteenth article was submitted and purports to have been ratified than it is and will be to gain the consent of the majority of the people to changes in the fundamental law.

"When the constitutional meaning is clear a practical construction by legislative action, though repeated several times and never before challenged, can not overthrow what is seen to be a constitutional requirement. (Fairbank v. United States, 181 U. S., 283, 311.) Frequent violations of the Constitution do not justify this court to give sanction to them by furthering an erroneous practice or construction. It is the highest duty, of course, not to perpetuate error. The fact that previous amendments to the Constitution have not been properly made a part of such instrument does not justify a present construction which is contrary to the intent of the founders of our Federal Government, because neither Congress nor the courts have the lawful power to so construe the fundamental article of government delegated by the power of the people themselves when once convinced of the error. (See Oakland Paving Co. v. Hilton, 69 Calif, 479, 502; Warfield v. Vandivere, 60 Atlantic, Md., 538.)

"Such a present construction as to the method prescribed by the Constitutiton for a two-thirds vote of both Houses, by which an amendment to the Constitution is deemed necessary, would not operate to disturb prior amendments where the practice in the procedure has been erroneously carried out, by reason of the fact that the people themselves have acquiesced in those particular instances. (Pease v. Peck, 18 Howard, 595, 597.) In Barden v. Northern Pacific Railway (154 U. S., 288) this court said, on page 322, that those doctrines only will eventually stand which bear the strictest examination and the test of experience.

"IV. THREE-FOURTHS OF THE STATES HAVE NOT RATIFIED IN THE CONSTITUTIONAL SENSE.

"The Constitution by Article V, by one method, confers upon the Congress power to propose amendments to the 'legislatures' of the several States, which, when ratified by three-fourths thereof, become parts of the Constitution.

"Nineteen States have incorporated in their constitutions the initiative and referendum feature, whereby a division of legislative power is made between the representative branches of the Government and the people. Two other State constitutions contain referendum provisions only. The State of Ohio, one of the 19 States, has in its constitution an express provision that amendments to the Federal Constitution must be submitted to the people of that State for ratification.

"In Ohio a submission of the eighteenth amendment has taken place and was rejected at the polls on November 4, 1919, which rejection has been upheld by the Supreme Court of Ohio and is now pending on writ of error in this court. (Hawke v. Smith.)

"In 12 States petitions have been presented for submission of the present proposition to the people. In the States of Washington, Nebraska, and Missouri decisions favorable to submission have been obtained.

"In the States of California, Michigan, Missouri, Nebraska, New Mexico, and Oklahoma the question of submission to a referendum vote is now pending. The action of the people in petitioning for a referendum in those States thereby qualifies the people as a part of their legislatures under their respective constitutions.

"This leads directly to the proposition that in the referendum States the people have reserved the right to make themselves a part of the 'legislatures' (Davis v. Ohio, 241 U. S., 565); and, having exercised this right, the amendment has not been and can not be validly ratified until the people of a sufficient number of States have approved the amendment at the polls. The word 'legislature' means the body or bodies exercising the legislative function.

"The framers of the Constitution had in mind that the word 'legislatures,' as used therein, might possibly comprehend law-making bodies under changed conditions, as is expressed in South Carolina v. United States (199 U. S., 437–448):

"'The Constitution is a written instrument. As such its meaning does not alter. That which it meant when adopted it means now. Being a grant of power to a Government, its language is general and as changes come in social and political life it embraces in its grasp all new conditions which are within the scope of the powers in terms conferred. In other words, while the powers granted do not change, they apply from generation to generation to all things to which they are in their nature applicable. This in no manner abridges the fact of its changeless nature and meaning.'

"There is no definition in the Constitution of the word 'legislature.' The several States were left free to repose their legislative power in any body or set of men they might desire.

"When, by Article V, it was provided that constitutional amendments be ratified by the legislatures of the several States, clearly it was intended that the ratification should be by the legislative power. In referendum States the people have reserved to themselves the option of becoming not merely a third constituent of the legislature but may, if they choose, exercise a legislative authority superior to the acts of their assemblies. The division of legislative power between representative assemblies and the people is best exemplified in the constitution of the State of Utah (see Kettleborough on 'State Constitutions,' p. 1355). Article 6, section 1, of the constitution of Utah, provides: 'The legislative power of the State shall be vested—

"'(1) In a senate and house of representatives, which shall be designated the Legislature of the State of Utah;

"'(2) In the people of the State of Utah, as hereinafter stated.'

"Where the legislative power is divisible the consent of all the constituent parts must be obtained in order that a ratification may be valid.

"In the State of Florida the constitution provides that Federal amendments can not be ratified except by a 'legislature' elected after the proposed amendments have been submitted to the State for ratification.

"That in referendum States the question of the ratification of the eighteenth amendment must be submitted to the people before the 'legislatures' of these States can be said to have passed on the question of ratification is sustained by a number of authorities. (State v. Polley, 26 S. Dak., 5; State v. Hildebrant, 94 Ohio State, 154, affirmed 241 U. S., 565; State v. Howell, 181 Pac., 920 (Sup. Ct., Wash.); State v. Amsbury, Dist. Ct., Lancaster County, Nebr., Morning, J., Aug. 18, 1919; Hawke v. Smith, Sup. Ct. Ohio, Sept. 30, 1919, now pending on writ of error in this court as docket No. 582; Carson v. Sullivan, Circ. Ct. Cole County, Mo., Slate, J.)

"The contention that the power delegated in the Constitution originally to amend by legislatures in the sense contended for by the defendants, which purports a ratification of the so-called eighteenth article by the representative bicameral bodies of the respective States, is a power then delegated and now irrevocable is answered by taking into consideration the fact that the people of the respective States might entirely by their constitutions abolish such bodies in the form they existed at the time the Constitution was first adopted, and that, therefore, no ratification of the Constitution by the legislatures of the respective States, in the sense contended for in the case at bar, would be possible, the consequences being that the statesmen who framed the instrument and the people who ratified it had no such thought in mind and, therefore, that Constitution does not so read.

"Three-fourths of the States, therefore, have not ratified the so-called article and, the constitutional requirements not having been complied with, it is not a part of the Constitution.

"V. PRIOR AMENDMENTS TO THE CONSTITUTION.

"In an examination of the 17 prior amendments it is submitted that they disclose subject matter germane to the original instrument.

"It is settled that the first 10 amendments, as is set forth in the preamble thereto, are merely safeguards declaratory and restrictive of the express or implied declarations of the main body of the instrument. The Constitution was not changed thereby as to powers, and said amendments are regarded as contemporaneous with it because of the conditional requirement upon the entry of some of the States, and consequently of all, that they should become a part thereof for the express purpose of safeguarding the rights and liberties of the individuals composing the several States.

"The first 10 amendments to the Federal Constitution contain no restrictions upon the powers of the State, but were intended to operate solely on the Federal Government. (Barron v. Baltimore, 7 Peters, 243; Spies v. Illinois, 123 U. S., p. 166; Brown v. New Jersey, 175 U. S., p. 174.)

"The eleventh amendment was for the purpose of requiring a construction of the original instrument to the effect that the judicial power should not extend to controversies between a State and citizens of another State, a contrary construction having been placed upon the instrument in Chisholm v. Georgia, 2 Dall., 419.

"The twelfth amendment was corrective of the method of the election of President and Vice President of the United States.

"The thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments were the result of the Civil War and the circumstances which gave rise to it. As was said in the Slaughterhouse cases (83 U. S., p. 36), these amendments may be said to rise to the dignity of a new Magna Charta.

"The thirteenth amendment blotted out slavery and forbade forever its restoration. This subject had been dealt with in the original Constitution (Art. I, sec. 2, par. 3) in its reference to representation determined by the number of free persons; Article I, section 9, paragraph 1, which prohibited Congress from interfering with the migration or importation of such persons as any of the States should think proper to admit prior to the year 1808; Article IV, section 3, which provided that no person held to service or labor in one State under the laws thereof, escaping into another, should in consequence of any law or regulation therein be discharged from such service or labor, but should be delivered up upon demand.

"Slavery at that time was contrary to the laws of England. (Somerset v. Steward, 20 State Trials 1, 82.) In 1789 the Quakers of New York and Philadelphia, assembled in their annual meeting, drew up petitions asking the Congress to take steps toward abolishing the trade in slaves and, as an effective measure, to prohibit vessels employed in that trade from being entered and cleared at the various ports. The petitions were submitted to the House of Representatives February 11, 1790, and on the following day another petition from the Pennsylvania Society for Promoting the Abolition of Slavery was received. The several petitions were referred to a special committee and later to the Committee of the Whole House. (See House Journal of 2d sec. of the 1st Cong., p. 14.)

"That committee reported that under the Constitution Congress was restrained from prohibiting the importation of slaves until 1808 and was restrained from the emancipation of slaves until that time, and that the Congress had no authority to interfere in the internal regulations of particular States, in the principles of morality and religion, and other matters for their comfort and well-being, referred to in the report.

"The Committee of the Whole House found and reported that the migration or importation of slaves could not be prohibited prior to 1808; that Congress had no power to interfere with their emancipation in any of the States; but that Congress had authority to restrain the African slave trade.

"The report of the committee was laid on the table. (See Documentary History of the United States, Woodrow Wilson, vol. 5, pp. 272–274.) We believe that it is unquestioned, and therefore unnecessary to quote from the debates that the failure to prohibit slavery in the Constitution originally, or to emancipate the slaves, was due to the compromise and inability at that time to formulate a union on any other basis. The matter was, therefore, left in abeyance, and the Civil War ultimately resulted as might have been expected on a compromise so contrary to the Declaration of Independence.

"Mr. Lincoln in his first inaugural address, quoted from one of his own earlier speeches, saying:

"'I have no purpose, directly or indirectly, to interfere with the institution of slavery in the States where it exists. I believe I have no lawful right to do so, and I have no inclination to do so.'

"He called attention to the Republican platform which nominated him, which contained the following:

"'Resolved, That the maintenance inviolate of the rights of the States, and especially the right of each State to order and control its own domestic institutions, according to its own judgment exclusively, is essential to that balance of power on which the perfection and endurance of our political fabric depend.

* * *'

"The position taken by him was the strongest possible declaration in favor of the rights of the respective States. The abolishing of slavery, as this court has said, was by the arbitrament of war and in this manner the change in the internal affairs of the States was effectuated in accordance with the emancipation proclamation.

"The ratification of the amendments to the Constitution, by the southern legislatures, the States not being permitted to return to the Union until this had been done, is not analogous to the present situation.

"The fourteenth amendment was held, in the Slaughterhouse cases, to remove the difficulty as to the definition of citizenship, which impaired the right of the freedman to and had reference to the limitations placed thereon in the Dred Scott case, and it was to remove this difficulty and to clearly define citizenship, not only in the United States but in the State, that the first clause was incorporated, and Mr. Chief Justice Field, in Bartemyer v. Iowa (18 Wall., 129, 138), said that by the fourteenth amendment no one had ever pretended, as far as he knew, that that amendment interfered in any respect with the police power of the State.

"The second clause defined the rights of citizens which have at all times been enjoyed by the citizens of the several States, among whom the negro was necessarily incorporated as a part, subsequent to the war.

"The third clause was declaratory of the life, liberty, and property of the individual, protected by due process of law, but this, as was stated in U. S. v. Cruikshank (92 U. S., 542), added nothing to the rights of one citizen as against the other.

"The fourth clause merely provided that no person should be denied within its jurisdiction equal protection of the laws.

"The fifteenth amendment merely invested the citizens of the United States with a new constitutional right; that is, exemption from discrimination in the exercise of the elective franchise on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude. (U. S. v. Cruikshank, 92 U. S., 542, citing Miner v. Happersett, 21 Wall., 178.)

"The sixteenth amendment had reference to a power of taxation delegated to the Congress by the Constitution, and merely provided for a different exercise thereof.

"The seventeenth amendment changed the method of election of United States Senators.

"All of these amendments, it will be seen, are but matters germane to the original Constitution, having to do with government and not with municipal law, and were corrective of errors concluded to be existent in the original document or improvements on the original Constitution, and are entirely dissimilar, it is respectfully submitted, in nature from the present so-called eighteenth article.

"VI. CONCURRENT POWER—WHAT CONCURRENT POWER MEANS.

"Concurrent power under the eighteenth amendment is a power in the Federal Government to enforce the amendment only so far and to the extent that the same relates to the external concerns of the United States and within the peculiar domain of the Federal Government to regulate commerce among the States as heretofore, as distinguished from the right of the State of New Jersey to enforce said amendment intrastate by virtue of the power conferred on said State exclusively under said amendment. (Complainant's bill, art. 22, pp. 35-36.)

"A. A literal interpretation.

"The eighteenth amendment provides:

"'SECTION 1. After one year from the ratification of this article the manufacture, sale, or transportation of intoxicating liquors within, the importation thereof into, or the exportation thereof from the United States and all territory subject to the jurisdiction thereof for beverage purposes is hereby prohibited.

"'SEC. 2. The Congress and the several States shall have concurrent power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.'

"A literal interpretation of the amendment presents some novel and perplexing inquiries, which lead to startling conclusions. The amendment literally construed contemplates the United States as a whole. The prohibition contained therein is directed against the manufacture, sale, transportation within, importation into, or exportation from the United States and all territory subject to its jurisdiction of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes.

"Under section 1, the States as sovereign entities, having separate governments, boundaries, jurisdictions, and functions—in short, the units—are disregarded. Under such an interpretation State governments are not recognized, State boundaries disappear, State jurisdictions are ignored. The compact mass, the aggregate, is the jurisdiction within which the amendment is to be enforced.

"The enforcement of the prohibition contained in the amendment within the United States and territory subject to its jurisdiction is committed to two agencies:

"1. The Congress;

"2. The several States.

"The division of power between the two enforcing agencies limits neither of them. Their respective powers to carry out the provisions of the amendment are operative within the territory designated in the amendment. The enforcement power is as broad as the jurisdiction. Therefore the legislative powers of the several States, whatever they may be, or in what manner they shall be exercised, are operative equally throughout the United States and the territory subject to its jurisdiction in interstate commerce as well as in foreign commerce and the right of the Congress to legislate for different localities within the State having utterly divergent conditions of life and habits can not be denied. Certainly such an effect was never contemplated.

"The principle of decentralization is one which almost seems a part of the very nature of the race to which we belong. (Cooley Const. Lim. (7th ed.), 263.)

* * * * * * *

"The constitutional amendment was proposed and ratified after this manner:

"In the Sixty-fifth Congress Senator SHEPPARD by joint resolution (No. 17) proposed the enforcement clause as follows:

"'The Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation and nothing in this article shall deprive the several States of their power to enact and enforce laws prohibiting traffic in intoxicating liquors.'

"The latter part of the clause was later eliminated, so that it read when it was sent to the House from the Senate:

"'The Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.'

"It is obvious from this reading that had it been finally passed in this latter form there would have been given to Congress the power to enforce the prohibition in the manner in which Congress has heretofore enforced constitutional amendments where it has been given power to do so by appropriate legislation. Had section 2 of the amendment been left in the shape as submitted by the Senate to the House of Representatives, the contention of the defendants as made in these cases would be the correct one.

"The Lower House, however, amended the clause to read as it was finally passed, after the Senate had concurred therein, so that it now reads and is operative as follows:

"'The Congress and the several States shall have concurrent power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.'

"The result is either that the several States have the power according to the literal interpretation or have the power alleged by the complainant.

"It is clear, therefore, that as proposed by Congress and as ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the States, there was no intention that paramount power should be given to Congress to enforce the prohibition, and also that a different construction as to concurrent power is to be placed upon the amendment than would otherwise have been the case.

"It is submitted that it is the duty of this honorable court to place upon this amendment such a construction as will make it reasonably effective. In the words of Mr. Webster in his argument in the case of Gibbons v. Ogden (9 Wheat., p. 20):

"'A reasonable construction must be given to the Constitution; and such construction is as necessary to the just power of the States as to the authority of Congress.'

"B. The true construction of concurrent power in eighteenth amendment.

"In approaching the question now under discussion it is necessary that we constantly keep before us our peculiar dual form of government. This is clearly defined by Mr. Justice Brewer in the case of South Carolina v. United States (199 U. S., 437):

"'We have in this Republic a dual system of government, National and State, each operating within the same territory and upon the same persons, and yet working without collision because their functions are different. There are certain matters over which the National Government has absolute control, and no action of the State can interfere therewith, and there are others in which the State is supreme and in respect to them the National Government is powerless. To preserve the even balance between these two Governments and to hold each in its separate sphere is the peculiar duty of all courts, preeminently of this—a duty oftentimes of great delicacy and difficulty.'

"In Kent's Commentaries, volume 1, lecture 18, page 388, Mr. Justice Chase is cited from the case of Calder v. Bull (3 Dall., 386), where he said, 'that the State legislatures retained all the powers of legislation which were not expressly taken away by the Constitution of the United States, and he held that no constructive powers could be exercised by the Federal Government.'

"In Sturges v. Crowninshield (4 Wheaton, 193), also cited by Kent in the same connection, it is stated: 'That the powers of the States remained, after the Constitution, what they were before, except so far as they had been abridged by that instrument. The mere grant of a power to Congress did not imply a prohibition on the States to exercise the same power.'

"'Not only, therefore, can there be no loss of separate and independent autonomy to the States through their union under the Constitution, but it may be not unreasonably said that the preservation of the States and the maintenance of their governments are as much within the design and care of the Constitution as the preservation of the Union and the maintenance of the National Government.' (Texas v. White, 7 Wall., 700, 725.) 'In other words, the two Governments, National and State, are each to exercise their power so as not to interfere with the free and full exercise by the other of its powers.' (McCulloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheaton, 316.)

"Mr. Justice Swain, in Railroad Co. v. Fuller (84 U. S., 560), said:

"'In the complex system of polity which exists in this country the powers of government are divided into four classes:

"'(1) Those which belong exclusively to the State;

"'(2) Those which belong exclusively to the National Government;

"'(3) Those which may be exercised concurrently and independently by both; and

"'(4) Those which may be exercised by the States, but only until the Congress shall see fit to act upon the subject. The authority of the State then retires and lies in abeyance until the occasion for its exercise shall occur.'

"Mr. Chief Justice Marshall, in McCulloch v. Maryland (4 Wheaton, 316), said, on page 430:

"'We have a principle which is safe for the States and safe for the Union. We are relieved, as we ought to be, from clashing sovereignty; from interfering powers; from a repugnancy in a right in one Government to pull down what there is an acknowledged right in another to build up; from the incompatibility of a right in one Government to destroy what there is a right in another to preserve.'

"To keep each Government within its sphere and to preserve the even balance of power between them has been the concern of this court from the beginning.

"The framers of the eighteenth amendment must be presumed to have known the constitutional history of this country and the dual form of government under which it operates, as declared by this court from time to time. With these decisions in mind, did they not for the purpose of making the eighteenth amendment reasonably effective, intend that in matters of local government the individual States would enforce it, in which sphere of action they are supreme, and that in its external features the power of enforcement should be committed to the Congress, in which sphere the Congress is supreme?

"An examination of the cases and a history of the legislation leading up to the enactment of the eighteenth amendment justifies this view.

"At the time of the ratification of the eighteenth amendment the Federal Government had the power to prohibit the transportation of intoxicating liquors in interstate commerce and the States had a similar power to prohibit intoxicating liquors within their territorial limits. The amendment conferred no power to prohibit but took from each of these sovereign governments the power to regulate the subject matter of intoxicants for beverage purposes within their respective spheres of action. The amendment did, however, for the first time in the history of the Constitution, confer in express terms a power upon the States to enforce a Federal amendment, which power is described to be concurrent with that of the National Government.

"The Federal legislation enacted under the commerce clause of the Constitution for the regulation of intoxicating liquor has invariably recognized the right of the State to control intoxicants as a matter of local self-government.

"The acts of the Congress were in the nature of ancillary legislation for the purpose of more effectually aiding the States, within their respective jurisdictions, to prohibit that which under their police powers the States had the right to do.

"We will not burden the court with a long citation of cases of the futile attempts of the States to prevent shipments from territory commonly described as wet into States which had enacted prohibition laws. Eventually recourse was had to the Congress, and under the commerce clause of the Constitution the Wilson Act of 1890 was enacted, which provided that fermented, distilled, or other intoxicating liquors transported into any State or territory should, upon arrival, be subject to the operation and effect of the laws of such State or Territory.

"The Webb-Kenyon Act of 1913 provided that the shipment or transportation of intoxicating liquors from one State into another intended to be used in violation of any law of such State or Territory should be a misdemeanor.

"The Reed Act is an amendment to the Webb-Kenyon law.

"Although Congress always had the right to suppress intoxicating liquors in interstate commerce under the guise of regulation, it refrained from so doing, merely aiding the States to more effectively carry out their enactments, and this, it is submitted, discloses on the part of the Federal Government a legislative purpose to leave the control of intoxicants to the States, it being one of the powers of local self-government.' (Clark Distilling Co. v. Western Maryland Railroad Co., 242 U. S., 311.)

"Thus the power that Congress always possessed to prohibit the transportation in interstate commerce of intoxicating liquors and which it did not in the past deem wise to adopt as a general policy is now made obligatory upon it under the amendment.

"From the history of the legislation it can be conclusively argued that the concurrent power clause of the eighteenth amendment, under which the States have an authority coequal with the Federal Government, confirms the policy which Congress and the prohibition States pursued for the more effective regulation of intoxicating liquors, and such policy under the amendment is now extended to all the States of the Union.

"C. The concurrent power granted in section 2 of the amendment must be construed so as not to work conflict or inconsistency.

"Had Congress only been endowed with power by the amendment as in several other cases, to enforce the prohibition by appropriate legislation, the States could not have legislated in any way which would have at all conflicted with the terms of any congressional enactment.

"The use of the words which extended to Congress and the several States concurrent power precludes the construction that has heretofore been placed upon the power of Congress with respect to that of the States since the word 'concurrent' has not heretofore been used in the Constitution. The use of the term in the Constitution is new, and it is submitted that the construction placed upon 'concurrent jurisdiction' by the courts in the case of boundary jurisdiction between the States is not applicable to the present situation any more than the ruling of the courts of England with respect to tidal streams as navigable waters is applicable to the tidal streams in this country. The courts of the United States have found it necessary to define differently the navigability of the streams with respect to tidal waters, because of the different situation existing in the United States than from that of England, in which country streams that are not tidal are not navigable. So where the operation of the powers of the National Government are distinguished from those of the respective States, it is our insistment that this court will find it necessary to place a construction upon the words 'concurrent power' which will be appropriate to the enforcement of the amendment giving due respect to the rights of the State governments and the rights of Congress.

Mr. Webster, in the argument in Gibbons v. Ogden (9 Wheat., p. 12), said:

"'What sort of concurrent powers were these, which could not exist together? * * * The Constitution was framed for all the States. * * * It is the true wisdom of these governments to keep their actions as distinct as possible. The General Government should not seek to operate where the States can operate with more advantage to the community; nor should the States encroach on ground which the public good, as well as the Constitution, refers to the exclusive control of Congress.'

"Mr. Justice McLean, in the License cases (5 How., 504, p. 592), said:

"'That the police power of a State and the foreign commercial power of Congress must stand together. Neither of them can be so exercised as materially to affect the other. The sources and objects of these powers are exclusive, distinct, and independent, and are essential to both governments.

"'This power (internal police) can neither be abdicated or bargained away (by the States), and is inalienable, even by express grant.' (Mr. Justice Pitney, Atlantic Coast Line R. R. Co. v. Goldsborough, 232 U. S., 548, p. 558; Denver & Rio Grande R. R. Co. v. Denver, 250 U. S., 241, p. 244.)

"It is necessary to so construe 'concurrent power' to enforce the prohibition that a true concurrence may take place in power and effect. Such a concurrence may be illustrated by two individuals making separate journeys by separate routes to the same place of destination, or it may be further illustrated by the use in war of an army and a navy, the objective being a victory, the power used being concurrent but distinct, neither encroaching upon the other, and neither necessarily requiring the withdrawal of the one or the other because of conflict.

"The defendants, if our understanding of their contention is correct, hold to the view that there is no real concurrent power, but that Congress is supreme, and that the States may exercise jurisdiction in the premises by necessary uniformity in legislation with that of Congress, which, we contend, is a mere dependence.

"In the Passenger cases it is said, Seventh Howard, 282, at page 399:

"'That a concurrent power excludes the idea of a dependent power.'

"It is submitted that this was stated in considering the Constitution when it contained no such grant of power in words as in the present instance, and had to do with the subject of the right of the States to legislate on a matter with which Congress was endowed with power under the Constitution; and at page 396:

"'A concurrent power in the States to regulate commerce is an anomaly not found in the Constitution. If such power exist, it may be exercised independently of the Federal authority.'

"Such power—that is, concurrent power—now exists if the present article of amendment is determined by this court to be valid. The question is how may such an anomaly not heretofore found in the Constitution be exercised in the manner indicated in the eighteenth amendment? In the words of Mr. Justice McLean:

"'The State power may be exercised independently of the Federal authority if such power exist.'

"The power exists by reason of the fact that the States are to have 'concurrent power' with Congress. How, then, may Congress and the States act independently and yet exercise the concurrent power conferred? It is submitted that it may only be accomplished by each power acting in its sovereign and exclusive sphere, namely, the Congress in interstate commerce, in the Territories, in the District of Columbia, and in foreign affairs, on the one hand, and the respective States in the exercise of their police powers on the other.

"In this way only may a real concurrence of power be exercised and harmoniously carried out.

"To extend to the States a power concurrent with Congress in its exclusive sphere, it is submitted, would be to extend to the States a power not intended by those who framed and those who concurred in the amendment. And, conversely, it is equally true that it was never intended by the same reasoning to extend to Congress a power to operate in those things which concern alone the decentralized governments of the respective States according to the peculiar needs of the people of the locality in which sphere the States are supreme.

"It is our insistment that if the defendants' contention be correct and the eighteenth amendment authorizes Congress to enforce the same within the State of New Jersey, it follows as a matter of course that it has also authorized the State of New Jersey to enforce the amendment wherever foreign commerce or commerce between the States, in intoxicating liquors, directly touches the State of New Jersey. The result of such a construction would be to make a sweeping radical change in the whole theory which has been evolved from the Constitution of the United States in regard to the exclusive control of Congress over a wide field of commerce.

"It was said in re Rahrer (140 U. S., 545), at 554:

"'The power of the State to impose restraints and burdens upon persons and property in conservation and promotion of the public health, good order, and prosperity is the power originally and always belonging to the States, not surrendered by them to the General Government nor directly restrained by the Constitution of the United States, and essentially exclusive.'

"In the Civil Rights cases (109 U. S., 313) Mr. Justice Bradley said:

"'That legislation under that amendment can not properly cover the whole domain of rights appertaining to life, liberty, and property, defining them and providing for their vindication. That would be to establish a code of municipal law regulative of all private rights of man and man in society. It would be to make Congress take the place of the State legislatures and to supersede them. It is absurd to affirm that, because the rights of life, liberty, and property (which include all civil rights that men have) are by the amendment sought to be protected against invasion on the part of the State without due process of law Congress may, therefore, provide due process of law for their vindication in every case; and that, because the denial by a State to any persons of the equal protection of the laws is prohibited by the amendment, therefore Congress may establish laws for their equal protection.'

"In Barbiere v. Connelly (113 U. S., 27, 31) Mr. Justice Field said:

"'It is not to be doubted that the power to make the ordinary regulations of police remain with the individual States and can not be assumed by the National Government.'

"This power to prohibit, therefore, in view of these well-settled principles in our constitutional law should be construed just in the sense in which they have been understood in the Constitution. The power to prohibit, which the National Government possessed, was part of its power under the commerce clause of the Constitution. The remainder of the power to prohibit was vested in the States. The power which is vested in the States is to be construed in connection with the tenth amendment to the Constitution, which expressly reserves to the States all powers not conferred on the Federal Government.

"In principle this case is not essentially different from the claims made under the fourteenth amendment in the Slaughterhouse cases (83 U. S., 36, p. 78). Again the contention that that amendment had conferred powers which were essentially State powers upon the Federal Government, Mr. Justice Miller said, as we have before quoted:

"'These consequences are so serious, so far-reaching and pervading, so great a departure from the structure and spirit of our institutions; when the effect is to fetter and degrade the State governments by subjecting them to the control of Congress in the exercise of powers heretofore universally conceded to them, of the most ordinary and fundamental character; when, in fact, it radically changes the whole theory of the relations of the State and Federal Governments, to each other and of both these governments to the people, the argument has a force irresistible in the absence of language which expresses such purpose too clearly to admit of doubt.'

"Mr. Justice McLane in the Passenger cases (48 U. S., 383, p. 399), in discussing the impossibility of a real concurrent power existing in two distinct sovereignties to regulate the same thing and in a situation where there existed only such concurrent power as has been heretofore defined to mean the supremacy of Congress in place of conflict, said:

"'That the action of one, unless there be an arrangement'—that is, as to uniformity of legislation—'must necessarily precede the action of the other, and that which is first, being competent, must establish the rule.'

"He contended that—

"'Such was an unequal power unless one might undo what the other does, and that this must be the result of their action.'

"He continued by saying:

"'But the argument is that a State, acting in a subordinate capacity, wholly inconsistent with its sovereignty, may regulate foreign commerce until Congress shall act on the same subject, and that the State must then yield to the paramount authority * * *.'

"He added, however:

"'But this argument degrades the States by making their legislation, to the extent stated, subject to the will of Congress. State powers do not rest upon this basis. * * *

"'State powers are at all times and under all circumstances exercised independently of the General Government and are never declared void or inoperative except when they transcend State jurisdiction.'

"The reasoning in Prigg v. Penn. (16 Pet., 539), leads to the same logical result—the right to have fugitive slaves returned was created by the Federal Constitution. Therefore, being a right created by the Constitution, it must, according to the majority opinion in that case, be enforced by the national authority exclusively and not by the States. In other words, a national right must be under the jurisdiction of the National Government. If the right to have the slaves returned had been a right vested in the States before the adoption of the Constitution, the plain inference is that the States then would have had the power.

"In construing, therefore, this power to prohibit, we must separate it into its parts, assigning the parts which are national to the National Government and the remaining parts to the States. This construction would interpret the second section, declaratory of what the constitutional rule in this case would be in giving force to the concurrent power clause, such an interpretation as to fully maintain the proper balance of power, avoiding what would otherwise be an inevitable conflict of sovereignty, and we submit it expounds the true intent of the amendment.

"This amendment affects the commerce clause in the Constitution, and it must be construed to restrict the will of Congress to permit interstate shipments of intoxicating liquors, for beverage purposes, into the States. We give full effect to this perplexing question under the well-settled rules of construction.

"The whole theory of the relations between National and State Governments would be thrown out of joint if the power of the States was in anywise impaired by this eighteenth amendment. Would it not, as Mr. Justice Miller said in the Slaughter-house cases, above quoted, 'constitute this court a perpetual censor upon all legislation of the States on the civil rights of their own citizens under this amendment, with authority to nullify such as it did not approve as consistent with those rights as existed at the time of the adoption of this amendment? * * *' As he further said (p. 82): 'Under the pressure of all the excited feeling growing out of the war, our statesmen have still believed that the assistance of the States, with power for domestic local government, including the regulation of their civil rights, was essential to the perfect working of our complex form of government. * * * Though they have thought proper to impose additional limitations upon the States and to confer additional power on that of the Nation, whatever fluctuations may be seen in the history of public opinion on this subject during the period of our national existence, we think it will be found that this court, so far as its functions required, has always held with a steady and even hand the balance between State and Federal power, and we trust that such may continue to be the history of its relation to that subject, so long as it shall have duties to perform which demand of it a construction of the Constitution or any of its parts.'

"The defendants have contended before the bar of this court in earlier cases, and probably will so contend in this case, that the expression 'concurrent jurisdiction' as defined heretofore in this court refers to separate, distinct, and independent action by the States and by Congress respectively, exercised by the two Governments, as stated in the case of Fox v. State of Ohio, 5 How., 410, 418, to the effect that the exercise of a concurrent jurisdiction might be productive of occasional interferences in the policy in any branch of administration. In the same connection it was there said there were three cases of alienation of State sovereignty, namely:

"'Where the Constitution in express terms granted an exclusive authority to the Union; where it granted in one instance an authority to the Union and in another prohibited the States from exercising the like authority; and where it granted authority to the Union to which a similar authority in the States would be absolutely and totally contradictory and repugnant.'

"It will be observed as the words 'concurrent power' were defined in that opinion and as contended for by the defendants, there were no express words in the Constitution granting such a power but that always under the Constitution, in case of any conflict whatever, the Constitution was supreme in authority and that, therefore, Congress had paramount power in the premises to enforce as distinguished from any other power.

"The dissenting opinion by Mr. Justice Story, in Houston v. Moore, 5 Wheat., 47, has the same thought in view to the effect that the powers—

"'So granted are never exclusive of similar powers existing in the States, except where the Constitution has expressly in terms given an exclusive power to Congress or the exercise of a like power is prohibited to the States, or there is a direct repugnancy or incompatibility in the exercise of it by the States.'

"The defendants will contend that the power of Congress is not of such a nature as would be necessarily exclusive but is to be exercised by Congress with the States retaining their right to exercise it at the same time, subject only to the qualification that in the case of a direct conflict between State and Federal laws the latter must prevail.

"All the definitions heretofore made of concurrent power are such as define an entirely different exercise of power than is now granted in the amendment. The amendment, if upheld by this court, grants a power from the people of the United States to the States of the Union and to Congress. The source is the same as it flows to both agencies of government, the National Government and the governments of the respective States. By its words it gives to all exactly the same authority to carry into effect and enforce by prohibition the manufacture, sale, or transportation of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes within, the importation thereof into, or the exportation thereof from, the United States and all territory subject to the jurisdiction thereof, and concurrent power is granted to all to enforce the same by appropriate legislation. This grant by the legislatures of the respective States, in ratifying the proposal, is an entirely different grant than those heretofore enumerated in the Constitution. It entirely removes from the reading of this amendment the application of the clause in the Constitution as to the supremacy of the enactment of Congress which would displace or run counter to an enactment of any one or all of the States. The States must retain their powers of economy and police in order to maintain their sovereignty, and the words 'concurrent power' must be, it is submitted, defined in a sense exclusive to the States and exclusive to the United States in accordance with the needs of each State and the United States, otherwise the use of the word 'appropriate' in connection with the word 'concurrent' can not properly be made. While appropriate legislation has been defined to be such as may be necessary and proper, in this case, it is submitted, the word 'proper' has the sense of peculiar or exclusive, and as applied to the express grant of power equally to the Congress and the several States it must be such that there may be no conflict because the idea of concurrence immediately ceases when it is necessary for the one governmental body to withdraw in favor of the other.

"In the Passenger cases we find, by again referring thereto (7 How., p. 399), it was said:

"'Concurrent power in two distinct sovereignties to regulate the same thing is as inconsistent in principle as it is impracticable in action. It involves a moral and physical impossibility. Joint action is not supposed, and two independent wills can not do the same thing.'

"And we add that it is also clear that 49 independent wills can not do the same thing, and that if they must coucur by joint or uniform legislation, Congress would have supreme power and not concurrent power, which would be a construction, we submit, authorizing legislation not appropriate in the premises.

"Under the construction contended for by the plaintiff, with each sovereign acting within its supreme sphere, it will make effective the prohibition contained in the eighteenth amendment, without conflict between the Federal Government and the sovereign States, without conflict in their operations and without disturbing that dual form of government which is the genius and character of our Nation.

"VII. THE NATIONAL PROHIBITION ACT IS NOT APPROPRIATE LEGISLATION.

"As alleged in the bill of complaint in this action the defendants herein are threatening to enforce within the State of New Jersey the national prohibition act, having for its purpose, by title 2 thereof, the enforcement of the so-called eighteenth amendment.

"The part of the so-called eighteenth amendment pertinent to this discussion reads as follows:

"'SECTION 1. After one year from the ratification of this article the manufacture, sale, or transportation of intoxicating liquors within, the importation thereof into, or the exportation thereof from the United States and all Territories subject to the jurisdiction thereof for beverage purposes is hereby prohibited.

"'SEC. 2. The Congress and the several States shall have concurrent power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.'

"The subject matter prohibited by the said amendment is intoxicating liquor for beverage purposes. Section 1 speaks for itself. It is a plain prohibition, providing for the suppression of intoxicating liquor for beverage purposes. Section 2 is merely a grant of power to enforce the provisions of section 1. The mere statement of the phrase 'beverage purposes' implies its meaning. The phrase 'intoxicating liquor' has a well-defined meaning in the law. The last-mentioned phrase is defined in Black's Law Dictionary as follows:

"'Any liquor used as a beverage and which when so used in sufficient quantities ordinarily or commonly produces entire or partial intoxication.

"'Any liquor intended for use as a beverage or capable of being so used which contains alcohol either obtained by fermentation or by the additional process of distillation in such proportion that it will produce intoxication when imbibed in such quantities as may practically be drunk.'

"The enforcing agency is here limited to carrying out the provisions of a specific prohibition. Any enforcing act should, therefore, be tested out by inquiring whether the subject matter is consonant with the definition of the subject matter contained in the prohibitory amendment itself.

"An examination of the text of Title II of said act (Exhibit II, p. 41, bill of complaint) shows that Congress has by said act framed a definition of the phrase 'intoxicating liquor,' which definition, as complainant shows, includes liquor containing an alcoholic content so fixed as not to be intoxicating in fact; that regardless of their intoxicating or nonintoxicating qualities, said act purports to prohibit and to illegally regulate by name the use of liquids denominated 'beer,' 'ale,' and 'porter'; that said act illegally attempts to regulate the manufacture, sale, possession, and use of liquor for medicinal purposes; that said act illegally limits the amount of liquor that may be, for medicinal purposes, used internally during a definite period of time, and illegally attempts to prohibit the use of liquor for medicinal purposes for any but a known ailment; prohibits its use in conjunction with other medicines, and further illegally attempts to regulate the manufacture, sale, possession, and use of liquor intended to be used for nonbeverage purposes.

"In short, the said act purports to regulate and prohibit things not within the prohibition of the Constitution. It is submitted that there is nothing in either section of the amendment directly permitting this to be done. Neither is there any merit in the possible claim that, as a means of making the provisions of the amendment effective, Congress may prohibit and regulate, by definition or otherwise, liquids not in fact intoxicating or not in fact used for beverage purposes.

"In framing its enforcement legislation Congress has not that degree of liberty of action with which its war powers may be exercised nor that degree of freedom from restraint with which the several States may exercise their police power. (Purity Extract Co. v. Lynch, 226 U. S., 192.)

"The power of Congress in this instance is to enforce a prohibition expressly limited in its scope, and to permit it, under an authorization to enforce, to enlarge the scope of the prohibition by suppressing and regulating things not comprehended in the amendment is, in effect, to thwart the will of the people as expressed in their Constitution and further to interfere with rights to an extent beyond that necessary to remedy the mischief aimed at in amending the Constitution. (Slaughterhouse cases, 16 Wall., 36; Civil Rights cases, 109 U. S., 1; the Employers' Liability cases, 207 U. S., 463.)

"In this connection it is pertinent to quote from the well-reasoned opinion (not yet reported) of Judge Geiger in the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Wisconsin, in the case of Manitowoc Products Co. against Hiram A. Sawyer and others, a case in which this particular part of the act of Congress was attacked on substantially the same grounds as here:

"'These suggestions all lead us back to the fundamental and elementary principle that in enforcing a prohibition, the end of the enforcing act, therefore its subject matter must come within the confines of the constitutional subject matter. If this is not true, then, as suggested, what is the limit to an enforcing power when once exercisable in respect of definition for enforcing purposes; when the legislature may say with scarce a limitation on its right that it may define as culpable that which, under the constitutional provision, is left inculpable.

"'We are not here dealing with a legislative provision seeking to prescribe a rule of evidence which when presented shall furnish a presumptive or prima facie basis for inferring culpability. We are dealing with a provision of a legislative act aimed to enforce a constitutional prohibition against intoxicating liquor, but which, being enforced, denies to the individual, conclusively, opportunity to assert that he is outside of the range of constitutional interdiction. The plaintiffs' product—in point of fact containing five times the alcoholic content prescribed by the enforcing act—is, in this case, conceded not to be intoxicating liquors; and were the case before us upon indictment, the result would be a conviction and an establishment of guilt under the enforcing act, notwithstanding the full concession that nothing has been done to establish constitutional culpability. Obviously, though without desiring to pass upon it as a question in issue, if one-half of 1 per cent were prescribed by the enforcing act as a presumptive basis, or a prima facie showing of the intoxicating quality of the product, we should have before us a markedly different case; for then the constitutional fact would not only have to be established, but the party accused would have full opportunity to negative culpability. It may be conceded that the presence of alcohol is a chief characteristic of intoxicating liquors. But the very concession in the present case demonstrates that the fact—the intoxicating quality of the prohibited thing, which by the Constitution is placed within the field of disputation—may depend wholly upon the matter of the degree of alcoholic content.

"'Therefore, the constitutional terms themselves measure the field of and place within it the fact or facts open to disputation. To permit legislative power to enter this field, enlarge or restrict it, prescribe the range of disputation by giving an element of fact the conclusive, indisputable force of establishing culpability, simply destroys the amendment, or, in the present case, transforms it into a general grant of power, not to enforce the subject of prohibition of "intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes," but to legislate upon the broad subject of beverages; and the particular enforcing act and any other act which may be framed under the power of definition forbids and punishes and will forbid—or permit, if in legislative discretion that is proper—percentages; and will foreclose inquiring into the fact which the Constitution declares is the condition of prohibition, just as effective as (see Bailey v. Alabama, 219 U. S., 219) breach of a contract was attempted to be made conclusive evidence of fraudulent breach under a statute aiming to punish the latter.

"'In this connection cases cited and the view expressed that by including nonintoxicants in a definition of intoxicants the legislature does not thereby presume to make intoxicants out of nonintoxicants are not at all pertinent. Probably all will concede at least that limitation on legislative power. The controversy arises when the legislation charged solely with the enforcement of a limited prohibition directs its efforts to matters outside of the limitation, interdicts them conclusively as of the same grade of culpability and subject to the same penalties as the constitutionally prohibited thing; when it punishes as intoxicating that which is not so, and which, upon the law before us, the national sovereignty has left free to be done by not prohibiting it.

"'Every consideration of the matter requires a negative answer to the question propounded by the plaintiff in this case; that the act in question, in so far as it defines or it attempts to define intoxicating liquors, by including therein nonintoxicants, can not be sustained.'

"VIII. THE COURT HAS JURISDICTION OF THIS CONTROVERSY.

"A. The State of New Jersey is a real party in interest.

"The State of New Jersey, in compliance with its duty to protect the health of its people, has licensed persons to engage in the practice of medicine and surgery within its borders. The persons so licensed are, in effect, its agents in the preserving of the public health. The bill of complaint in this cause alleges that alcoholic liquor, used either alone or in conjunction with other medicines, is in common use by physicians and surgeons in the State of New Jersey in the prevention and cure of diseases and other ailments; that these defendants threaten to enforce within said State the provisions of Title II of the act of Congress known as the national prohibition act, which act in a drastic manner regulates the use by physicians and surgeons of alcoholic liquor in the prevention and cure of diseases and other ailments, and, consequently, it is respectfully asserted, the health of the people of said State is jeopardized.

"As alleged in the bill in this cause, the State of New Jersey, for the common benefit of all of its people, maintains, either directly or through its municipal agencies, numerous hospitals for the insane, the feeble-minded, the epileptic, the aged and infirm, persons afflicted with tuberculosis, homes for soldiers, and various other institutions; that in its conduct of these institutions the State employs physicians; that the use of alcoholic liquors for the prevention and cure of diseases and other ailments by these physicians is also drastically interfered with by the act which defendants threaten to enforce.

"It is asserted, therefore, that the State of New Jersey occupies the position of parens patriæ, guardian, trustee, and representative for (a) the people of the State and (b) its dependents and wards so resident in its numerous institutions.

"In Heckman v. United States (224 U. S., 413) it was held that the United States had capacity to maintain a suit to set aside conveyances made by allottee Indians of allotted lands. The theory upon which the United States was held capable of maintaining the action in this case was the recognition by the court of the dependent status of the Indians and the duty of the United States in the premises.

"In United States v. New Orleans Ry. Co. (248 U. S., 507) the court, in sustaining the right of the United States to institute the action, said: 'There is an obligation for those for whose benefit the suit is brought.' (Missouri v. Illinois, etc., 180 U. S., 208; Kansas v. Colorado, 185 U. S., 125, 206 U. S., 46; Georgia v. Tenn. Copper Co., 206 U. S., 230.)

"If the so-called eighteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States is a valid amendment, then, it is respectfully asserted that by section 2 of said amendment the duty is placed on the State of New Jersey (exercising power concurrently with Congress) to enforce the provisions of section 1 of said amendment, and it is therefore by virtue of this duty the right of the State of New Jersey to ask this court to restrain these defendants from interfering with its proper exercise of the power so given to enforce the said amendment.

"In re Debs (158 U. S., 564) the question arose concerning the jurisdiction of a court of equity at the suit of the Government to enjoin interference with the transportation of the mails. The court, while adverting to the fact that the United States had a property in the mails, declined to place its decision upon that ground alone, and rested it also upon governmental duty. The court said (pp. 584, 586):

"'Every government intrusted by the very terms of its being with powers and duties to be exercised and discharged for the general welfare, has a right to apply to its own courts for any proper assistance in the exercise of the one and the discharge of the other, and it is no sufficient answer to its appeal to one of those courts that it has no pecuniary interest in the matter. * * * The National Government, given by the Constitution power to regulate interstate commerce, has by express statute assumed jurisdiction over such commerce when carried upon railroads. It is charged, therefore, with the duty of keeping those highways of interstate commerce free from obstruction, for it has always been recognized as one of the powers and duties of a government to remove obstructions from highways under its control.'

"In Kansas v. Colorado (206 U. S., 86) the United States rested its petition for intervention upon its duty of legislating for the reclamation of arid lands. This duty was regarded as sufficient cause for permitting its intervention in the controversy. (See also United States v. San Jacinto Tin Co., 125 U. S., 273; United States v. Bell Tel. Co., 128 U. S., 315.)

"Contrary to the provisions of the tenth amendment of the Constitution, these defendants are threatening to interfere with the reserved powers of the State of New Jersey, as alleged in the bill of complaint, and the State is therefore justified in maintaining this suit not only to protect its rights as a sovereign State but likewise for the people of the State.

"The State further claims the right to institute this suit to prevent irreparable damage in the way of loss of ratable property, taxes, and license fees, which it will sustain should the defendants be permitted to enforce within its borders the unconstitutional act in question.

B. This action is not against the United States.

"In Traux v. Raich (239 U. S., 33) the court said:

"'As the bill is framed upon the theory that the act is unconstitutional and that the defendants, who are public officers concerned with the enforcement of the laws of the State, are about to proceed wrongfully to the complainant's injury, through interfering with his employment, it is established that the suit can not be regarded as one against the State. Whatever doubt existed in this class of cases was removed by the decision in Ex parte Young (209 U. S., 123, 155, 161), which has repeatedly been followed.' (Ludwig v. West. Union Tel. Co., 216 U. S., 146; Western Union Tel. Co. v. Andrews, 216 U. S., 165; Herndon v. C. R. I. & P. R. R., 218 U. S., 135, 155; Hopkins v. Clemson College, 221 U. S., 636, 643, 645; Philadelphin Co v. Stimson, 223 U. S., 605, 607, 620; Home Tel. & Tel. Co. v. Los Angeles, 227 U. S., 278, 293.)

"C. The questions involved are constitutional questions and therefore justiciable.

"We ask the court in the case at bar, in the determination of the questions submitted, to construe the Constitution of the United States.

"First, as to whether the so-called eighteenth amendment is a proper addition to the instrument, in view of the express and implied limitations contained in Article V; and "Second, whether the national prohibition act, by Title II, is constitutional.

"When the validity of the alleged amendment and the constitutionality of the legislation thereunder is questioned there is presented to this court for determination a justiciable question. For the reasons set forth in the bill of complaint and which are discussed in this brief, it is respectfully submitted a justiciable question has been presented. (Bott v. Secretary of State, 63 N. J. L., 289, and cases cited therein; United States v. Lee, 106 U. S., 196, 208–9; Koehler & Lange v. Hill, 60 Iowa, 543, 603; Hammond v. Clark, 136 Ga., 312; 12 Corpus Juris, p. 880, and cases cited in note 36.)

"It is respectfully submitted that the motion of the defendants should be denied.

"MOTION TO FILE ORIGINAL BILL.

"Now comes the State of New Jersey, by its attorney general, Thomas F. McCran, and moves the court for leave to file the bill of complaint herewith exhibited, in a suit between the State of New Jersey and citizens of other States, and arising under the Constitution and laws of the United States, for the purpose of enjoining the defendants from enforcing within the State of New Jersey, by an abuse of power, without lawful and constitutional authority or by a wrongful and erroneous interpretation thereof, such titles and sections of an act of Congress, the short title of which is the 'National prohibition act,' as apply and are designed to give effect to the so-called eighteenth article of amendment to the Constitution of the United States of America; and that proper process may issue thereon, notifying the defendants of the filing of said bill, and that they appear and answer thereto and defend the same.

"STATE OF NEW JERSEY,

"SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES.

"October term, 1919. No. —. Original.

"[State of New Jersey, complainant, v. A. Mitchell Palmer, Attorney General, and Daniel C. Roper, Commissioner of Internal Revenue, defendants.]

"ORIGINAL BILL IN EQUITY.

"The State of New Jersey, complainant, brings this bill of complaint for itself and representatively for its citizens in their sovereignty against the defendants above named, and respectfully shows unto this honorable court as follows:

"I. That the State of New Jersey is one of the States of the United States and that the defendant, A. Mitchell Palmer, is a citizen of the State of Pennsylvania, duly appointed and acting Attorney General of the United States, and Daniel C. Roper is a citizen of the State of South Carolina and the duly appointed and acting United States Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and that both officials reside in the Capital of the United States.

"II. This is a suit of a civil nature, arising under the Constitution and laws of the United States against citizens of other States of the United States, who, as designated officials of the Government of the United States, with their and each of their subordinates, agents, and servants, are charged with the duty in their respective spheres of action, of enforcing acts of Congress under the Constitution, and is for the purpose of enjoining them from acting, by an abuse of power, without lawful and constitutional authority or by a wrongful and erroneous interpretation thereof, to enforce, within the State of New Jersey, the so-called national prohibition act of Congress of October 28, 1919, or such titles and sections thereof as apply and are designed to give effect and carry out the prohibitions of the so-called eighteenth amendment to the Constitution in intrastate commerce and as interfere with and limit the taxing power of the State of New Jersey; as interfere with, restrict, and prohibit the collection of the internal revenues of complainant; and as interfere with the government of its institutions and of its wards; and as limit, impair, and interfere with its powers of economy and police, as well as the businesses and liberties of its citizens to its irreparable injury as hereinafter more particularly set forth, in which congressional enactment aforesaid the defendants are officially charged with the enforcement of the provisions thereof and the prohibitions therein contained. The restraint is sought because the national prohibition act is, or such aforesaid parts thereof are, invalid, unconstitutional, and void, and the said so-called eighteenth amendment, though purporting to be the fundamental authority for said national prohibition act, is not, either in whole or in part, an amendment to the Constitution, but is wholly null and void and not enforceable in the State of New Jersey, while the State of New Jersey has not, nor have the people thereof ratified or consented to said so-called amendment, and because whether said so-called amendment and national prohibition act are void or not, there exists the intent on the part of said defendants wrongfully to so construe and hurtfully enforce the 'concurrent power' clause of said so-called eighteenth amendment, and thus, furthermore, and, in any event, to make, on such account said national prohibition act by such construction and enforcement unconstitutional and void.

"III. The rights and interests of the State of New Jersey and its citizens are involved in the premises, and therefore this suit, under the executive direction of the governor of the State of New Jersey, is instituted, both under the common law by the attorney general of said State and by him under the statutory authority in such case made and provided.

"IV. The complainant alleges that, as a colony, Nova Ceserea, or New Jersey, was settled largely by subjects of Sweden and of the States of the Netherlands and of the British Crown, and that said colonists, as hereinafter set forth, exercised and enjoyed the inherent right of self-government in the management and control of their own affairs as a community and in the establishment of their civil institutions for the protection of the rights and liberties of the individual in so far as the same were applicable to their new conditions and circumstances.

"(a) That letters patent from Charles II, King of England, were granted and delivered, dated March 12, 1664, to his brother James, the Duke of York, in which the said King gave and granted unto his said brother, his heirs and assigns, certain territory therein described, granting therein and thereby to the said Duke of York, his deputies, agents, commissioners, and assigns such power and authority as therein described to govern the subjects of such King, his heirs and successors, as should from time to time adventure themselves unto or that should at any time thereafter inhabit any part or parts therein referred to, which territory the State of New Jersey, as now constituted, formed a part, according to such laws, orders, ordinances, directions, and instruments as by the said duke should be established; so always as the said statutes, ordinances, and proceedings should not be contrary to, but as near as conveniently might be, agreeably to the laws, statutes, and Government of the realm of England; also to make, ordain, and establish all manner of orders, laws, directions, instructions, form, and ceremonies of government and magistracy fit and necessary for and concerning the government thereof, so always that the same should not be contrary to the laws and statutes of the realm of England as near as might be agreeable thereunto; and gave and granted unto the said duke, his heirs and assigns, and also to all and every such governor or governors or other officers or ministers as by the said duke, his heirs or assigns, should be appointed to have power and authority of government and command in and over said inhabitants of said territory for their safety and defense.

"(b) That shortly after the making of said grant the territory included therein was conquered by the military powers of the States of the United Provinces of the Netherlands, and shortly thereafter the said territory was surrendered to the King of England, and thereupon, in order to make good and affirm and establish the aforesaid grant, the said King of England, by his letters patent, bearing date on or about the 29th day of June, 1674, granted and conveyed unto the said Duke of York all the rights, powers, and privileges contained in the patent first hereinbefore mentioned.

"(c) That by lease dated the 23d and release dated the 24th of June, 1664, the said Duke of York, after reciting the grant previously made to him by the aforesaid letters patent, granted, bargained, sold, released, and confirmed to Lord John Berkeley and Sir George Carteret the territory of Nova Ceseren, or New Jersey, in as full and ample a manner as the same had been granted to the said Duke of York by the before-recited letters patent, and all the estate, right, title, interest, benefit, advantage, claim, and demand of the said James, Duke of York of in and to the said premises, etc., to have and to hold, etc., the said tract of land and premises, their heirs and assigns forever, etc., as by reference to the said release will more fully and at large appear.

"(d) That a concession and agreement of the lords proprietors aforesaid of the Province of Nova Ceserea, or New Jersey, dated February 10, 1664, to and with all and every the adventurers and all such as should settle or plant there was made and published on or about said time by the said John Berkeley and George Carteret, for the purpose of inducing people to settle and dwell in New Jersey, and together with subsequent declarations, was a pledge, guaranty, and assurance to such settlers, relating to the power and rights of the governor and council and secretary or register, surveyor general, assemblymen, and other officers and to the legislative power of the assembly, as they should judge most conducive to the general good and welfare of the Province as by reference thereto will more fully appear. These grants and concessions bear even date with the appointment and commission of Sir Philip Carteret, the first governor of New Jersey, appointed by the said proprietors—Lord John Berkeley and Sir George Carteret.

"(e) That by quinpartite deed dated June 1, 1676, between said George Carteret of the first part, William Penn of the second part, Gawn Lawry of the third part, Nicholas Lucas of the fourth part, and Edward Billinge of the fifth part, it was recited, inter alia, the conveyance of his (Berkeley's) moiety to or half of Nova Ceseren, or New Jersey, by said John, Lord Berkeley, by bargain and sale deed, dated March 18, 1673, to John Fenwick, and by two other indentures, one of bargain and sale, dated February 9, 1674, from John Fenwick and Edward Billinge (who claimed equitable interests) of the one part, and William Penn, Gawn Lawry, and Nicholas Lucas of the other part, and by the second being an indenture of tripartite grant, release, or confirmation, dated February 10, 1674, between said John Fenwick, Edward Billinge of the second part, and the said William Penn, Gawn Lawry, and Nicholas Lucas of the third part, and by several other good and sufficient assurances in the law duly executed, said moiety or half part of all said land so conveyed as aforesaid to said Fenwick was conveyed unto and vested in the said Penn, Lawry, and Lucas, their heirs and assigns forever, so that the said last-mentioned held and were actually seized of the other undivided moiety or half part of all and every, the said premises of Nova Ceserea, or New Jersey, as tenants in common with Sir George Carteret, who was then actually seized of the other undivided moiety or half part of all and every the same premises, who held the same to him and his heirs in common with the said William Penn, Gawn Lawry, and Nicholas Lucas. And it was further recited in said deed that said Carteret, Penn, Lawry, and Lucas had agreed to make a partition of New Jersey into two parts, and therein and thereby said Billinge, Penn, Lawry, and Lucas granted to Sir George Carteret, his heirs and assigns forever, the easterly part of New Jersey, to have and to hold in severalty, and Sir George Carteret, by the same indenture, granted to said Penn, Lawry, and Lucas, their heirs and assigns forever, the westerly part of New Jersey, to have and to hold to them, their heirs, and assigns in severalty, and the division line between east and west Jersey was therein described as by reference thereto will more fully appear.

"(f) That both of said tracts of East and West Jersey were, by a deed of surrender from the proprietors of East and West Jersey of their right or pretended right of government, surrendered and yielded up for themselves and heirs to Anne, Queen of England, including all powers of government as to New Jersey granted by King Charles II to the Duke of York, and by the Duke of York to the said proprietors, as by reference to the said surrender will more fully appear, and which surrender was accepted by the Queen in council April 17, 1702, and ordered to be enrolled in Her Majesty's high court of chancery; that thereafter on the 16th day of November in said year the said Queen issued instructions to the then captain general or governor of Nova Ceserea or New Jersey, to wit, Edward, Lord Cornbury, that he should call together certain persons therein designated, who should constitute the membership of her council of said Province and one general assembly, to consist of 24 members, to be chosen in the manner therein designated by the inhabitants, householders of the city or town of Perth Amboy, in East New Jersey; 2 by the inhabitants, householders of the city and town of Burlington, in West New Jersey; 10 by the freeholders of East New Jersey; and 10 by the freeholders of West New Jersey, with power to make laws as therein enumerated for the government of the colony, which government, complainant avers, continued until the declaration of colonial rights by the American Congress of October 14, 1774, and the establishment at Burlington of the first constitution of New Jersey, on July 2, 1776, as hereinafter set forth in items (g) and (h) of this paragraph.

"(g) That the colony of New Jersey, when declaring a dissolution of the Government of Great Britain over the colony, the more effectually to unite the people of the colony and enable them to exert their whole force in their own necessary defense against the military powers under George the Third, King of England, by advice of the Council of the American Colonies to such colonies, adopted for themselves, respectively, with other colonies, a government such as should best conduce to their own happiness and safety and the well-being of America in general as was set forth in the preambles thereto, and established at Burlington, in said State, July 2, 1776, in Provincial Congress, a constitution in and by which a government suitable to the needs and uses of a free and independent State and people came then and there into being and which still exists under the new constitution of the State as originally ratified by the people at an election originally held August 13, 1844, with subsequent amendments, wherein it is set forth and declared that government is instituted for the protection, security, and benefit of the people, and that they have the right at all times to alter or reform the same, whenever the public good may require it, and wherein it is declared that all men are by nature free and independent and have certain natural and unalienable rights, among which are those of enjoying life, liberty; acquiring, possessing, and protecting property; and of pursuing and obtaining safety and happiness.

"(h) That by a declaration of colonial rights by the American Congress, known as the First Continental Congress, sitting in Philadelphia, adopted October 14, 1774, at which were duly elected delegates from New Jersey, it was declared that the colonists were entitled to life, liberty, and property, and that they had never ceded to any sovereign power whatever a right to dispose of either without their consent; that our ancestors, who first settled these colonies, were entitled to all rights, liberties, and immunities of free and natural-born subjects within the realm of England, and further that the exercise of legislative power in the several colonies by a council appointed during pleasure by the Crown was unconstitutional, dangerous, and destructive to the freedom of American legislation, all and each of which the aforesaid deputies in behalf of themselves and their constituents claimed, demanded, and insisted on as their indubitable rights and liberties, which could not be taken away from them, altered, or abridged by any power whatever without their own consent by their representatives in their several provincial legislatures, and that said First Continental Congress in an address to the inhabitants of the several Anglo-American Colonies, adopted October 21, 1774, in reference to certain statutes of the British Parliament stated to be oppressive, declared that their immediate tendency was to subvert the right of having a share in legislation by rendering assemblies useless, and that the Second Continental Congress, at Philadelphia, on July 6, 1775, proclaimed that the colonists took up arms because by one statute it was declared that Parliament can 'of right make laws to bind us in all cases whatsoever.'

"(i) That by the American Revolution, which took place by the Declaration of Independence, bearing date July 4, 1776, and by its aforesaid Constitution, the State of New Jersey asserted and maintained its right to exercise complete legislative powers over its internal affairs and was and from thenceforth has been a free and independent State, and as such entitled to have and to hold all such rights as free and independent States may have and hold, to do all acts and things which independent States may of right do; and by force of said revolution and said independence the said State of New Jersey became invested with all and every power of government, property and rights of property within and appertaining to said State, which immediately before said revolution were vested in the Crown of England, and at the conclusion of said War of Independence against the Government of England its freedom and independence as a sovereign State was acknowledged by Great Britain in the treaty of Paris of September 3, 1783.

"(j) That the State of New Jersey, by Articles of Confederation, signed July 9, 1778, formed a league of friendship with other American States for the 'security of their liberties,' and under said Articles of Confederation New Jersey did not yield or surrender or delegate any legislative power over its internal affairs and civil institutions nor its powers of economy and police; and it was expressly provided by Article II of said Articles of Confederation that 'each State retains its sovereignty, freedom, and independence, and every power, jurisdiction, and right which is not by this confederation expressly delegated to the United States in Congress assembled,' and further provided by Article XIII, 'Nor shall any alteration at any time hereafter be made in any of them unless such alteration be agreed to in a Congress of the United States and be afterwards confirmed by the legislatures of every State.'

"(k) That by the ratification of the Constitution of the United States by the ninth State on June 21, 1788, the United States of America, under the Articles of Confederation, ceased to exist, and the United States of America, under the Constitution of the United States, composed of the several States, having agreed thereto, came into being, and the Government thereof was organized in March, 1789. That the State of New Jersey was the third State to ratify the Constitution on December 18, 1787, but said act of ratification by the people of New Jersey was made in good faith and with full assurance that said State and the people thereof relinquished only such portion of sovereign power as was necessary and essential for the creation and establishment of a limited National Government for the purposes and with the powers enumerated in the several articles of said Constitution, and that nothing might be the subject of an amendment under Article V thereof which is of a class that could by the nature thereof tend to the destruction either of the United States or the several States nor that might properly be the subject of general legislation as to its internal affairs; nor did the State of New Jersey by any of the 17 amendments thereto afterwards surrender any of the powers, including the powers of economy and police, which were expressly reserved to the States, respectively, or to the people, by the tenth article of amendment, and that the Constitution prior to amendment was accepted and put in force in anticipation of and in reliance upon the adoption of the first amendments afterwards made thereto, as an American bill of rights, interpretative and declaratory of the rights of life, liberty, and property of the citizens of the respective States, and which rights were always and originally comprehended within the words and meaning of the Constitution as first adopted as by the Bill of Rights were so interpreted and declared.

"V. And complainant is advised and therefore avers that the Constitution of the United States does not delegate to the National Government, nor to the people of the United States, any power of economy and police nor power of legislation with respect to the internal affairs and intrastate commerce of the State of New Jersey, nor is said power with respect to the internal affairs of the State of New Jersey prohibited by said Constitution to the State of New Jersey, but is expressly reserved to said State or to the people, according to the determination of the people of said State.

"VI. And complainant alleges that the Sixty-fifth Congress of the United States of America, at its second session, begun and held at the Capitol on Monday, December 3, 1917, assumed, as complainant is advised, a power not delegated to Congress by any provision of the Constitution of the United States, and in derogation of the Constitution of the United States and of the constitution of the State of New Jersey, and of the rights of the people thereof, and in a manner not authorized as aforesaid, purported to enact a joint resolution entitled 'Joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States,' afterwards known as and called the 'eighteenth amendment,' but without first resolving by a two-thirds vote of both Houses of Congress, as a condition precedent to the submission thereof to the several States for the ratification thereof by the respective legislatures of three-fourths of said States; that the proposed amendment was deemed by said two-thirds of both Houses necessary and without an affirmative vote thereof by two-thirds in number of membership of both Houses of said Congress that said proposal was deemed necessary.

"VII. And complainant is advised and alleges that although the proposal of the so-called eighteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, as aforesaid, was unconstitutional, inoperative, and void, on December 28, 1917, the Secretary of State of the United States, without authority in law and under the form, guise, and pretense of complying with constitutional procedure, forwarded, as complainant is informed and believes, a certified copy of said 'joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States,' to the governor of each State of the United States, and that the governor of each of said States, as complainant is advised, thereafter submitted said proposal of amendment as an eighteenth article of amendment to the Constitution of the United States, as set forth in said joint resolution of Congress, as aforesaid, to their respective bicameral houses of senate and assembly, and thereafter such bodies to the number of three-fourths thereof in the several States of the United States, assuming a power not delegated to said bodies by any provision of the Constitution of the United States, enacted resolutions of alleged ratification of the so-called eighteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States as submitted by Congress, under the form, guise, and pretense of complying with constitutional procedure.

"VIII. And complainant is advised and alleges that in 21 of said States purporting to have ratified by their respective legislatures the said proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States, namely, in the States of South Dakota, Oregon, Nevada, Montana, Oklahoma, Maine, Missouri, Michigan, Arkansas, Colorado, Arizona, California, Ohio, Nebraska, Washington, North Dakota, Mississippi, Utah, Massachusetts, Maryland, and New Mexico, the said bicameral bodies are duly restricted by provisions for an initiative and referendum vote or in the two last-named States by provisions for a referendum vote only of the people, and that in fact the said referendum vote only of the people, and that in fact the said States did not by their respective bicameral bodies and by vote of the people of said State ratify according to their respective constitutions the said purported proposal of amendment called the eighteenth amendment; and further that three States, namely, the States of Connecticut, Rhode Island, and New Jersey, have not ratified the said alleged proposal in any respect or manner, and therefore that three-fourths of the legislatures, in the constitutional sense, have not ratified the same, though thereafter certified copies of the resolution of alleged ratification of the so-called eighteenth amendment by the aforesaid bodies, except the Legislatures of Connecticut, Rhode Island, and New Jersey, were forwarded to the State Department of the United States, the certification of the alleged ratification from each State illegally and erroneously setting forth that the proposal contained in said joint resolution of amendment to the Constitution of the United States had been duly adopted as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States by the legislatures of said States, according to the provisions of the Constitution of the United States. Thereafter and under date of January 29, 1919, the Acting Secretary of State, purporting to act in compliance with the statute of the United States in such case made and provided, gave public notice, in and by a certain proclamation of said date, that said alleged amendment to the Constitution of the United States had been duly ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States in the United States, and had, accordingly, become valid to all intents and purposes as part of the Constitution of the United States. A copy of said notice or proclamation of the Acting Secretary of State is hereunto attached, marked 'Exhibit I,' to which reference is prayed. The said notice or proclamation embodies a full and accurate copy of the joint resolution of the Houses of Congress above referred to, as well as a full and accurate copy of the said alleged amendment to the Constitution of the United States, now known as the eighteenth article of amendment thereto.

"IX. Complainant is advised and therefore avers that said alleged eighteenth article of amendment to the Constitution of the United States is wholly null and void for all and singular the following reasons, to wit:

"(1) That the power purported to be exercised by Congress in enacting said joint resolution to submit thereby to the legislatures of the several States the alleged eighteenth amendment to the Constitution was not delegated to the Congress by the provisions of Article V of the Constitution, relating to amendments, in that it is not an amendment thereof within the true intent and meaning of that article, and the attempt to exercise such power was a proceeding unconstitutional and revolutionary, in that a written Constitution was well known and understood throughout the United States in the years 1787 to 1790, inclusive, to be an instrument prescribing, regulating, and providing for the exercise of powers of Government by the legislative, executive, and judicial branches thereof, and not to be itself an exercise of such powers, that such was intended to be the Constitution of the United States itself, that such was the intent and meaning of Article V in describing the instrument to be amended in accordance with the terms of that article, and that such was the intent and meaning thereof was declared and made clear by the tenth article of amendment to the Constitution, reserving to the respective States or to the people, as they themselves should determine, the powers not expressly delegated to the United States by the Constitution nor prohibited by it to the States, in order to form a more perfect union and permit, at all times, to the citizens of New Jersey, the right to alter or reform their own government whenever the public good might require it, as declared by article 1, section 2, of the constitution of New Jersey, wherein it is set forth that government is instituted for the protection, security, and benefit of the people, which right as aforesaid to so alter or reform the prohibition of the so-called eighteenth amendment by the citizens of New Jersey, in the interest of local government will be forever after denied them, tending thereby to destroy the essence of the Federal system intended to be created by the Constitution of the United States and thereby tending likewise to the disruption of the United States, rather than to the maintaining of the more perfect union which the public good requires.

"(2) That the special power conferred upon the legislatures of the several States of ratification of proposals to amend the Constitution of the United States was necessarily limited by the nature and purpose of the instrument the amendment of which was authorized; that the powers so conferred were to extend to alterations or additions which were in the nature of constitutional provisions, and did not extend to the exercise of ordinary legislative powers regulating the conduct of life, morals, and religion by private individuals nor of intrastate commerce, constituting government by legislation in the respective States nor to legislative powers of the Congress of the United States; and the prohibition by the alleged eighteenth amendment is mere legislation and not an amendment of the Constitution, but a pretense in the form and guise of an amendment to establish laws unalterable by the people by legislative act, thus wrongfully attempting to regulate and prohibit and deprive them, in their respective States and in the State of New Jersey, of liberty and property.

"(3) That two-thirds of the Members of both Houses of Congress did not as aforesaid in number by affirmative vote, necessary to a proposal of an article of amendment to the Constitution of the United States, deem it necessary or make such a proposal of the joint resolution purporting to propose to the legislatures of the several States the so-called eighteenth amendment, nor did they, by such resolution or otherwise, declare that they deemed the same necessary, and that according to the true intent and meaning of Article V of the Constitution of the United States it is a condition precedent to any amendment that two-thirds of said Members shall, in their judgment, deem an amendment necessary, and evidence their judgment by due action on their part before the Congress shall have power to propose to the several States any such amendment to said Constitution.

"(4) That the said joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States was not ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the respective States in the sense and meaning of the use of the term 'legislatures' in the Constitution of the United States as alleged in article 8 of this bill; and that, in any event, whatever might be the power of the people of the United States acting through conventions elected for that purpose or otherwise to include in the National Constitution ordinary acts of legislation unalterable by the people of the respective and several States contrary to any grant conferred or delegation of power given in the Constitution, and expressly reserved by the tenth article of amendment, and in contravention of ordinary acts of legislation under the power granted to the Congress by Article I of the Constitution of the United States, such as purports to be exercised by the prohibitions and alleged authority of said so-called eighteenth amendment, no such power has been exercised by the people of the United States in respect of such alleged eighteenth amendment, but the proposal was submitted, or attempted to be submitted, in the manner provided in Article V of the Constitution in the alleged exercise of a special power conferred by that article contrary to the true intent and meaning thereof, and that in most of the States the so-called ratification was made by the senate and house of assembly therein, as in each State, respectively, denominated, some of the houses of which, particularly as in the case of Florida, were elected by the people before the joint resolution containing the proposal was adopted by the Congress.

"(5) The prohibitions contained in and the alleged powers authorized in and conferred by the so-called eighteenth amendment were not legislation passed by the Congress and submitted to the President of the United States, and are not, therefore, law in the legislative sense, and the purported and alleged ratification of the prohibition contained in and the alleged powers authorized and conferred by said alleged amendment were withheld from submission to the people of the several States having in their constitutions provisions for reference to them of legislative acts of their respective legislatures before the taking effect thereof, and such acts purporting to ratify the proposal and amend the Constitution of the United States were not legislative acts, so that the law purporting to be constitutional matter as to method and form of government, though not so, has never been passed in the exercise of legislative power as delegated to the United States in and by said Constitution.

"(6) That the exercise of legislative power regulative and prohibitory of decentralized government in internal affairs of the several States under the people thereof in the guise and form of amendment to the Constitution of the United States, such as is attempted to be exercised in and by the alleged eighteenth amendment, thus establishing by centralization of power and authority without the consent of the State of New Jersey and its people and of other States and peoples thereof of laws unalterable and unreformable at all times by them is inconsistent with the fundamental purpose expressed in its preamble to form a more perfect Union and secure the blessings of liberty to posterity, and establishes a precedent whereby no powers will be reserved to the respective States or to the people and no limitation will exist, as expressed in the first 10 articles of amendment or elsewhere in said Constitution, but the powers reserved to and vested in the several States may be annulled and destroyed under the guise and pretense of amending the said Constitution.

"X. And complainant is further advised and believes, and therefore alleges, that although the so-called eighteenth amendment is not a valid amendment to the Constitution of the United States and is inoperative and void, the Sixty-sixth Congress of the United States of America at its first session illegally and erroneously assuming that a power has been delegated to Congress, by the provisions of the so-called eighteenth amendment, passed on October 28, 1919, over the veto of the President of the United States, an act entitled 'An act to prohibit intoxicating beverages, and to regulate the manufacture, production, use, and sale of high-proof spirits for other than beverage purposes, and to insure an ample supply of alcohol and promote its use in scientific research and in the development of fuel, dye, and other lawful industries,' with the short title of 'National prohibition act,' with the intent and purpose of enforcing the so-called eighteenth amendment within the State of New Jersey and the other States of the Union. A copy of the portion of said act of Congress dealing with the subject of prohibition under the alleged eighteenth article of amendment to the Constitution of the United States, so far as material to the present cause of action, and being Title II of said act of Congress is hereunto attached, marked 'Exhibit II,' and reference thereto is prayed as fully as if herein set forth at length.

"XI. And complainant further shows and alleges that the State of New Jersey, in the exercise of its inherent and exclusive right to manage and control its internal affairs as a separate community and a free and independent State, as aforesaid, and to pursue such policy by such legislation as will provide adequate revenue by developing the resources and encouraging industries within its territorial limits, and to regulate the welfare, morals, and conduct of its citizens, has permitted and caused to be legally established from the beginning within the State extensive and numerous manufactories for the production of intoxicating beverages and liquors for beverage purposes, and that many millions of dollars are invested therein and in the business of retailing the products thereof, and said manufactories and businesses have greatly added to the value of the ratable property within the State; that there are within the State, at the present time, large quantities of intoxicating beverages and liquors that were manufactured for beverage purposes prior to the alleged ratification and taking effect of the so-called eighteenth amendment, and said manufactory properties, real and personal, and intoxicating beverages are of great value as ratable property, amounting to many millions of dollars in money of the United States of America, and hitherto have been, and now are to some extent, a large source of revenue from taxation to complainant; and that should the aforesaid provisions of the national prohibition act be enforced, and continue to be enforced, within the State of New Jersey, the extensive business of manufacturing and selling intoxicating beverages and liquors for beverage purposes within the State of New Jersey will be destroyed and is now in the process of destruction, and the value of the property especially adapted for use in said businesses will be, and has already been, greatly depreciated, and the intoxicating beverages and liquors within the meaning of said statute, of use for beverage purposes now within the State, manufactured for beverage purposes prior to the alleged ratification and taking effect of the so-called eighteenth amendment, will become, and have practically for such purposes already become, of little or no value, whereby the revenue to the State of New Jersey from all said property, based upon the valuation thereof, will be, and has already to the material reduction of its necessary revenue from taxation, been seriously impaired and to the detriment of the self-government of the State and the welfare of its institutions, to the great and irreparable injury of complainant.

"XII. And complainant further shows and alleges that the State of New Jersey, through its municipal subdivisions, grants and has heretofore granted licenses for the sale of spirituous, vinous, malt, and brewed liquors containing more than one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol by volume, fit for the use for beverage purposes, and that the State of New Jersey and its municipal subdivisions have for many years derived annually and now derive, or until the taking effect of the so-called eighteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States did derive, extensive revenue from the fees for said licenses, said revenue amounting in the year 1918 to the sum of $2,442,899.46 lawful money of the United States of America, and such sum represents approximately the average revenue for other years prior thereto, which has been and is used in a large measure for the support of its said municipal subdivisions, and that should said national prohibition act be enforced within the State of New Jersey the said revenues to the State of New Jersey and to its municipal subdivisions will be entirely lost, to the great and irreparable injury of complainant.

"XIII. And complainant is further advised and alleges that in and by section 1 of Title II of said act it is provided that 'intoxicating liquor shall be construed to include alcohol, brandy, whisky, rum, gin, beer, ale, porter, and wine, and in addition thereto any spirituous, vinous, malt, or fermented liquor, liquids, and compounds, whether medicated, proprietary, patented, or in and by whatever name called, containing one-half of 1 per cent or more of alcohol by volume which are fit for use for beverage purposes,' and in and by section 3 of Title II of said act it is provided that 'no person shall on or after the date when the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States goes into effect manufacture, sell, barter, transport, import, export, deliver, furnish, or possess any intoxicating liquors,' viz, within the State of New Jersey, and such acts so alleged as offenses and crimes are therein made punishable by heavy fines, imprisonments, and forfeitures, as set forth in other portions of Title II of said act.

"XIV. And the complainant further shows and alleges that under an 'act to regulate the practice of medicine and surgery, to license physicians and surgeons, and to punish persons violating the provisions thereof,' enacted in the year 1894, with its supplements and amendments, it has regulated and now regulates and controls the practice of medicine and conduct by physicians and surgeons in professional practice in the State of New Jersey, and that its State board of examiners charges and collects from applicants for licenses fees for deposit in the State treasury on the issuance of such licenses to practice medicine and surgery in the State, wherein it is provided that any person, after the enactment of the statute, except as therein otherwise provided, who shall commence and continue the practice of medicine and surgery in any of its branches in said State without first having obtained and filed the license therein provided for contrary to the provisions of the act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and punished by fine and imprisonment, or both, as therein set forth; that the license therein provided is and has been issued to successful applicants who are and have been heretofore qualified and authorized to practice all branches of medicine and surgery, and that the examination of applicants for licenses is conducted covering subjects as follows: Obstetrics and gynecology, practice of medicine, including surgical anatomy and diseases of the eye, ear, and genitourinary organs, anatomy, physiology, chemistry, histology, pathology, bacteriology, hygiene, medical jurisprudence, and in such other subjects as the board of examiners may decide. That the national prohibition act, by Title II thereof, provides that no one shall manufacture, sell, purchase, transport, or prescribe any liquor for medicinal purposes without first obtaining a permit from the defendant commissioner when prescribed by a physician, as therein provided, except in certain limited cases therein set forth; that the said permits are limited to one year and may be granted as a condition subsequent to the giving of a bond, in the discretion of the defendant commissioner, in such form and amount as he may prescribe to insure compliance with the terms and provisions of the said title, and on the refusal of a permit by the commissioner to any applicant for such permit, the applicant may have a review of his decision before a court of equity, during the pendency of which, or until the final ruling, no prescription may be written, and that arbitrarily and unreasonably, contrary to the recognized usage of medical men in the State of New Jersey and from time immemorial, no physician is permitted by its terms to prescribe liquor, to afford relief from some ailment, of not more than a pint of spirituous liquor in 10 days to be taken internally (or even in the form of stimulating enemas in emergency), nor to prescribe liquor as a preventative of disease or ailment, particularly after exposure to wet and cold, to relieve internal congestion resulting from exposure, for the purpose of preventing acute respiratory diseases or ailments, nor are exceptions found therein permitting prescriptions whereby licensed physicians may prescribe alcoholic liquor in conjunction with other medicines, and, as a consequence, the prescribing of liquor with any other medicine or drug is prohibited in using combined stimulation when essential, thus preventing the proper exercise of the license or permit issued to practicing physicians of said State; and, further, that said title and section permit and authorize the absolute refusal, in the discretion of the commissioner, subject to appeal as therein provided, of licenses to those licensed and heretofore licensed to practice medicine and surgery in said State, which is contrary to the rights of the complainants and in divers other respects offending against it as a free and independent State and of the liberty, health, property, and welfare of its people, to its irreparable injury.

"XV. And the complainant further shows and alleges that it owns, conducts, and controls, either directly or through and in conjunction with its municipal and county agencies in government, numerous hospitals for the insane of great size, a village for epileptics, State prisons and penitentiaries, homes for boys and for girls, homes for the feeble-minded, and for tubercular patients, and reformatories; also soldiers' homes and various other institutions or agencies correctional and charitable in their nature, and maintains therein physicians resident and employed by the State of New Jersey and its municipal and county subdivisions, and that it calls in for the care and treatment, in conjunction with its resident physicians, such physicians as are conducting the general practice of medicine and surgery in the various communities of the State. That in many cases in the practice of medicine such physicians in care of the wards, patients, and those confined in involuntary servitude for crimes and offenses, treat such patients with liquor within the meaning of the national prohibition act, with and without combination with other drugs, for the purpose of producing heat and energy in pathological depressive states and in lethargic-physiological activities due to advancing years as well as to conditions in which the waning life force from general debility, senility, or any other cause requires stimulation, and especially in pneumonia and influenza cases, and in other necessities of bodily need, all of which care and treatment by its licensed and employed physicians and surgeons has been, is being, and will be seriously impaired, and perhaps without fault on the part of such physicians, the defendant commissioner may deprive them entirely or temporarily of the liberty of action permitted in said State by its licensing authority and freedom of judgment in the performance of their professional duties and in the employment of said professional servants, all of which is detrimental to the public health and the health of its wards and patients, and contrary to the fundamental charter and rights of the complainant and welfare of the people of the State of New Jersey in the premises.

"XVI. And complainant is informed and believes, and therefore alleges, that said national prohibition act by Title II, in section 1 thereof, defines the words 'intoxicating liquors' intended and required to be subject to the prohibition of the alleged eighteenth amendment, as meaning those liquors which contain one-half of 1 per cent or more of alcohol by volume, except such liquor as is exempted as to persons or uses, as therein noted, to which reference is hereby prayed, and complainant further alleges that the said standard of alcoholic content so fixed by said act is not intoxicating in fact, and that a content of 3½ per cent of alcohol in liquid by volume, and even a much larger per cent of such content of alcohol by volume, in liquid, is not intoxicating, when used for beverage purposes, and that liquor containing but one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol by volume is substantially less than one-seventh of the amount necessary to constitute such liquor an intoxicating beverage in fact.

"And complainant further alleges that the manufacture and sale of such nonintoxicating liquor, namely, spirituous, vinous, malt, or brewed liquor, is authorized and lawful under the existing laws of the State of New Jersey, authorizing the licensing thereof by sale for regulation and revenue, and that numerous persons, within the definition of the said act of Congress in the State of New Jersey, citizens thereof, prior to and at the time of the alleged ratification and taking effect of the so-called eighteenth amendment and the enactment of said national prohibition act, were engaged under the laws and licenses of the complainant State in the manufacture and sale for beverage purposes of such nonintoxicating liquor containing not to exceed 2¼ per cent of alcohol by weight, which is equivalent to 3⅕ per cent of alcohol by volume; which manufacture and sale for beverage purposes are prohibited by the terms and provisions of the said national prohibition act, and which prohibitions and restrictions therein contained are contrary to the terms of said so-called eighteenth amendment and are wholly erroneous in statement of fact as to what alcoholic content in liquid to be used for beverage purposes constitutes liquor intoxicating and is contrary to the definition and finding of fact as established by the provisions of an existing law of the State of New Jersey of March, 1920, entitled 'An act to prohibit the manufacture, sale, or transportation within the State of New Jersey of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes, defining the term "intoxicating liquors," and providing for the punishment of violations hereof,' which is hereunto annexed and made a part hereof, marked Exhibit III, reference to which is hereby prayed as if recited at length. That in and by section 2 of said act of the State of New Jersey intoxicating liquors are defined to be any alcoholic beverage containing more than 3½ per cent by volume, and any such alcoholic beverages are in said act prohibited from manufacture, sale, or transportation in said State; and said national prohibition act, by Title II, if enforced in the State of New Jersey contrary to the legislative enactments of said State, is unconstitutional, arbitrary, and oppressive, and deprives the complainant of revenue from its said licenses.

"XVII. And complainant alleges that by Title II of said act of Congress the word 'liquor' is defined and construed to include alcohol, brandy, whisky, rum, gin, beer, ale, porter, and wine, and in addition thereto any spirituous, vinous, malt, or fermented liquor, liquids, and compounds, whether medicated, proprietary, patented, or not, and by whatever name called, containing one-half of 1 per cent or more of alcohol by volume, which are fit for use for beverage purposes, and said act prohibits the use of the names of beer, ale, and porter in connection with the manufacture and sale of nonintoxicating malt beverages. And complainant further alleges that the names beer, ale, and porter have from time immemorial been used to designate and describe the malt beverages now familiar to the public under those names regardless of the alcoholic content or intoxicating qualities thereof; that many varieties of beer, ale, and porter contain less than one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol by volume; and that the deprivation of the right heretofore existing to manufacture liquids by their appropriate and long-established and widely known names of beer, ale, and porter in intrastate commerce, though not intoxicating in fact nor by the definition of Congress, as set forth in this bill, is unreasonable, unnecessary, arbitrary, and oppressive, and contrary to and injurious to the rights and interests of the complainant to license for revenue under its legislative enactments the manufacture or sale of nonintoxicating beverages by such names, and detrimental to the welfare of said State and its people.

"XVIII. And complainant is advised by counsel, and therefore avers, that said portion of the national prohibition act which by its terms is required to be enforced from and after the taking effect of the so-called eighteenth amendment, and by reason of its taking effect is now enforceable, and, as complainant is informed and believes, is considered by defendants enforceable, and is intended to be enforced according to its terms by them according to the construction placed upon said act by them severally and jointly, as aforesaid, and is now being and will be so enforceable and enforced by them after the conclusion of peace between the United States of America and the Government of Germany and the allies of Germany upon proclamation of the President of the United States that peace exists when such proclamation is made, as provided by the act of Congress of August 10, 1917, entitled 'An act to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel,' so that the war-time prohibition shall then cease, yet complainant is now and will be continuously hereafter subjected to irreparable injury by the provisions of said national prohibition act, enforceable or to be enforced, both now and hereafter, irrespective of the restrictions of war-time prohibition.

"XIX. And complainant is further advised, and therefore avers, that the defendants above named are by law expressly charged with the duty of enforcing the terms and provisions of that portion of the national prohibition act hereto annexed as Exhibit II and herein complained of within the State of New Jersey, and are now engaged in carrying out and intend unlawfully and unconstitutionally, by abuse of power, to attempt to carry out the provisions and enforce the prohibitions thereof without first having obtained the consent of the State of New Jersey or the people thereof, so as to deprive the State of New Jersey of that liberty in such management and self-government to which it always was and still is entitled as a free and independent State under the Constitution of the United States.

"XX. And complainant is advised, and therefore avers, that said portion in this bill excepted to of the national prohibition act of October 28, 1919, is unconstitutional and void and beyond the power of the Federal Government to enforce for all and singular the following reasons, to wit:

"(a) Because said act of Congress was enacted under and pursuant to the alleged authority purported to be conferred upon Congress in and by the alleged eighteenth article of amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which is itself null and void, as hereinbefore alleged.

"(b) Because said act of Congress prohibits and restricts the manufacture and sale in intrastate commerce of intoxicating liquors in the State of New Jersey from the time of the taking effect of said so-called eighteenth amendment.

"(c) Because the State of New Jersey has not concurred in the provisions of said national prohibition act of October 28, 1919, and if enforced without its concurrence or contrary thereto would violate, override, and nullify the rights and powers vested in and reserved to the State of New Jersey in respect to its internal and intrastate affairs and concerns under the Constitution of the United States and the amendments thereto.

"(d) Because said act of Congress interferes with and will depreciate and in a large measure destroy the taxable value of real and personal property manufactured and used in the manufacture and sale of liquor in the State of New Jersey, and is therefore destructive of free and independent government of the State of New Jersey under the people.

"(e) Because said act of Congress, by its provisions, has deprived and will permanently deprive complainant of its revenue from licenses from the manufacture and sale of spirituous, vinous, or fermented liquor, liquids, and compounds containing more than one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol by volume, amounting annually to not less than $2,442,899.46, thus depriving the

State directly and in its municipal subdivisions of a large part of the revenue necessary for the support of its State government.

"(f) Because said act of Congress, by its provisions, purports to and does interfere in the internal government of the people of the State of New Jersey, and operates to punish them by heavy fines, imprisonments, and forfeitures for violation of its provisions, thus preventing the application for licenses for sale of nonintoxicating beverages permitted under the laws of the State of New Jersey, which impairs the revenues of complainant.

"(g) Because said act of Congress, by its provisions, restricts the practice of physicians and surgeons of the State of New Jersey in the professional conduct in internal practice as regulated and licensed by complainant, and jeopardizes and menaces the health of its citizens and the rights and liberties of said physicians and surgeons in maintaining the public health, undertaking to severely punish them for violation of its prohibitions and provisions, and in the discretion of the defendant commissioner to deprive any or all of them from prescribing in their professional practice intoxicating liquors.

"(h) Because said act of Congress, by its provisions, interferes, hampers, prohibits, and restrains the complainant's employed physicians and surgeons, as well as its licensed physicians and surgeons, from their proper exercises of discretion in the treatment and prescribing for and in behalf of the wards, patients, and prisoners of the State of New Jersey in its own institutions and hospitals and those of its municipal subdivisions, and by its provisions makes it possible and provides that the license, in the exercise of the discretion of the defendant commissioner, may be refused or suspended as respects said physicians and surgeons, thus unwarrantably interfering in the internal and private affairs of said State government and making the exercise of their professional duties dependent upon the will or discretion of said defendant.

"(i) Because, in so far as it affects nonintoxicating liquors, said act of Congress is not appropriate legislation to enforce the prohibition contained in section 1 of said alleged eighteenth article of amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which is expressly confined and limited to intoxicating liquors, and because liquids denominated beer, ale, or porter, though nonintoxicating and not containing more than one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol, are by its terms prohibited.

"(j) Because said act of Congress, by its provisions, in attempting to regulate and prohibit in the State of New Jersey the manufacture and sale of nonintoxicating liquors as defined by the New Jersey Legislature, and in attempting to interfere with the regulation of the health, liberty, and property of the citizens of New Jersey, contrary to its exclusive and inherent powers of economy and police, is not appropriate legislation.

"XXI. And complainant further shows and alleges that the so-called eighteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, by section 2 thereof, provides that 'the Congress and the several States shall have concurrent power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation,' to wit, the prohibition contained in section 1 of said so-called article of amendment (Exhibit I). And complainant, not in any manner waiving its unalienable sovereign right and power to govern and control its internal affairs, and especially in respect of those sought to be ruled by said so-called eighteenth amendment, nor in any manner conceding that said amendment is valid, and protesting that said so-called amendment is an unlawful, revolutionary, and confiscatory invasion of its sovereignty, nevertheless shows: That contrary to the provisions of said section 2, and without any authority, constitutional or otherwise, Congress, by enacting the said national prohibition act, by its provisions, prohibitions, and restrictions has attempted to interfere with and encroach upon the exclusive power of the State of New Jersey to enforce said amendment intrastate, if the so-called article of amendment is valid, and the defendants have already, irrespective of the final decree of this honorable court, undertaken, and complainant is informed and believes intend, to enforce the said act, according to its terms, in the State of New Jersey, and have interfered and intend to interfere with the internal affairs and intrastate commerce of said State and thereby to override, encroach upon, and to such extent destroy complainant's powers of economy and police to the jeopardy of the welfare, health, happiness, liberty, and property of its citizens, in violation of the powers conferred by section 2 of said so-called eighteenth article of amendment; and complainant further is advised and alleges that the prohibition of the so-called eighteenth amendment is enforceable, if at all, if valid, within the State of New Jersey by its own State power, or concurrence, under its own laws in the enforcement thereof, as in this bill of complaint set forth and otherwise, and not contrary thereto, and particularly under the provisions of an act entitled 'An act to prohibit the manufacture, sale, or transportation within the State of New Jersey of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes, defining the term "intoxicating liquors," and providing for the punishment of violations thereof,' as aforesaid.

"And complainant further alleges that the power of the Federal Government by virtue of said so-called amendment, if valid, is a power to enforce said so-called amendment only so far and to the extent that the same relates to the external concerns of the United States and within the peculiar domain of the Federal Government to regulate commerce among the States, as heretofore, as distinguished from the right of the State of New Jersey, to enforce said so-called amendment intrastate, and to regulate its internal affairs, in that said alleged amendment confers on the State of New Jersey the right and power to legislate thereunder within its own borders.

"Forasmuch, therefore, as complainant is without adequate remedy at law and its only protection in the premises must arise from the powers of this honorable court, in the exercise of its original jurisdiction, the State of New Jersey respectfully prays that there be granted a writ of subpœna issuing out of this honorable court to be directed to the said A. Mitchell Palmer, Attorney General of the United States, and to the said Daniel C. Roper, United States Commissioner of Internal Revenue, the defendants herein named, demanding them and requiring them and each of them to appear and answer thereto, but not under oath, answer under oath being hereby expressly waived; and that the so-called eighteenth amendment be declared invalid, unconstitutional, usurpatory, and void; and that such portion of the national prohibition act as applies or relates to the enforcement of the so-called eighteenth amendment enacted by Congress under the assumed authority of said so-called amendment be declared unconstitutional and void, or if said so-called eighteenth amendment and the portions of the national prohibition act dependent thereon shall be found to be valid in whole or in part, or in any case, that defendants, their assistants, subordinates, agents, and servants be enjoined and restrained from enforcing such portions of the said national prohibition act in the State of New Jersey, in such manner as to interfere with the regulation of the internal affairs of the complainant, and that complainant may have such other and further relief as to this court may seem just and equitable in the premises.

"EXHIBIT I.

"AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION, 1919.

"[Frank L. Polk, Acting Secretary of State of the United States of America.]

"To all to whom these presents shall come, greeting:

"Know ye that the Congress of the United States at the second session, Sixty-fifth Congress, begun at Washington on the 3d day of December, in the year 1917, passed a resolution in the words and figures following, to wit:

"'Joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

"'Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That the following amendment to the Constitution be, and hereby is, proposed to the States, to become valid as a part of the Constitution when ratified by the legislatures of the several States as provided by the Constitution:

"'ARTICLE —.

"'SECTION 1. After one year from the ratification of this article the manufacture, sale, or transportation of intoxicating liquors within, the importation thereof into, or the exportation ducing heat and energy in pathological depressive states and in lethargic-physiological activities due to advancing years as well as to conditions in which the waning life force from general debility, senility, or any other cause requires stimulation, and especially in pneumonia and influenza cases, and in other necessities of bodily need, all of which care and treatment by its licensed and employed physicians and surgeons has been, is being, and will be seriously impaired, and perhaps without fault on the part of such physicians, the defendant commissioner may deprive them entirely or temporarily of the liberty of action permitted in said State by its licensing authority and freedom of judgment in the performance of their professional duties and in the employment of said professional servants, all of which is detrimental to the public health and the health of its wards and patients, and contrary to the fundamental charter and rights of the complainant and welfare of the people of the State of New Jersey in the premises.

"XVI. And complainant is informed and believes, and therefore alleges, that said national prohibition act by Title II, in section 1 thereof, defines the words 'intoxicating liquors' intended and required to be subject to the prohibition of the alleged eighteenth amendment, as meaning those liquors which contain one-half of 1 per cent or more of alcohol by volume, except such liquor as is exempted as to persons or uses, as therein noted, to which reference is hereby prayed, and complainant further alleges that the said standard of alcoholic content so fixed by said act is not intoxicating in fact, and that a content of 3½ per cent of alcohol in liquid by volume, and even a much larger per cent of such content of alcohol by volume, in liquid, is not intoxicating, when used for beverage purposes, and that liquor containing but one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol by volume is substantially less than one-seventh of the amount necessary to constitute such liquor an intoxicating beverage in fact.

"And complainant further alleges that the manufacture and sale of such nonintoxicating liquor, namely, spirituous, vinous, malt, or brewed liquor, is authorized and lawful under the existing laws of the State of New Jersey, authorizing the licensing thereof by sale for regulation and revenue, and that numerous persons, within the definition of the said act of Congress in the State of New Jersey, citizens thereof, prior to and at the time of the alleged ratification and taking effect of the so-called eighteenth amendment and the enactment of said national prohibition act, were engaged under the laws and licenses of the complainant State in the manufacture and sale for beverage purposes of such nonintoxicating liquor containing not to exceed 2¾ per cent of alcohol by weight, which is equivalent to 3⅕ per cent of alcohol by volume; which manufacture and sale for beverage purposes are prohibited by the terms and provisions of the said national prohibition act, and which prohibitions and restrictions therein contained are contrary to the terms of said so-called eighteenth amendment and are wholly erroneous in statement of fact as to what alcoholic content in liquid to be used for beverage purposes constitutes liquor intoxicating and is contrary to the definition and finding of fact as established by the provisions of an existing law of the State of New Jersey of March, 1920, entitled 'An act to prohibit the manufacture, sale, or transportation within the State of New Jersey of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes, defining the term "intoxicating liquors," and providing for the punishment of violations hereof,' which is hereunto annexed and made a part hereof, marked Exhibit III, reference to which is hereby prayed as if recited at length. That in and by section 2 of said act of the State of New Jersey intoxicating liquors are defined to be any alcoholic beverage containing more than 3½ per cent by volume, and any such alcoholic beverages are in said act prohibited from manufacture, sale, or transportation in said State; and said national prohibition act, by Title II, if enforced in the State of New Jersey contrary to the legislative enactments of said State, is unconstitutional, arbitrary, and oppressive, and deprives the complainant of revenue from its said licenses.

"XVII. And complainant alleges that by Title II of said act of Congress the word 'liquor' is defined and construed to include alcohol, brandy, whisky, rum, gin, beer, ale, porter, and wine, and in addition thereto any spirituous, vinous, malt, or fermented liquor, liquids, and compounds, whether medicated, proprietary, patented, or not, and by whatever name called, containing one-half of 1 per cent or more of alcohol by volume, which are fit for use for beverage purposes, and said act prohibits the use of the names of beer, ale, and porter in connection with the manufacture and sale of nonintoxicating malt beverages. And complainant further alleges that the names beer, ale, and porter have from time immemorial been used to designate and describe the malt beverages now familiar to the public under those names regardless of the alcoholic content or intoxicating qualities thereof; that many varieties of beer, ale, and porter contain less than one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol by volume; and that the deprivation of the right heretofore existing to manufacture liquids by their appropriate and long-established and widely known names of beer, ale, and porter in intrastate commerce, though not intoxicating in fact nor by the definition of Congress, as set forth in this bill, is unreasonable, unnecessary, arbitrary, and oppressive, and contrary to and injurious to the rights and interests of the complainant to license for revenue under its legislative enactments the manufacture or sale of nonintoxicating beverages by such names, and detrimental to the welfare of said State and its people.

"XVIII. And complainant is advised by counsel, and therefore avers, that said portion of the national prohibition act which by its terms is required to be enforced from and after the taking effect of the so-called eighteenth amendment, and by reason of its taking effect is now enforceable, and, as complainant is informed and believes, is considered by defendants enforceable, and is intended to be enforced according to its terms by them according to the construction placed upon said act by them severally and jointly, as aforesaid, and is now being and will be so enforceable and enforced by them after the conclusion of peace between the United States of America and the Government of Germany and the allies of Germany upon proclamation of the President of the United States that peace exists when such proclamation is made, as provided by the act of Congress of August 10, 1917, entitled 'An act to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel,' so that the war-time prohibition shall then cease, yet complainant is now and will be continuously hereafter subjected to irreparable injury by the provisions of said national prohibition act, enforceable or to be enforced, both now and hereafter, irrespective of the restrictions of war-time prohibition.

"XIX. And complainant is further advised, and therefore avers, that the defendants above named are by law expressly charged with the duty of enforcing the terms and provisions of that portion of the national prohibition act hereto annexed as Exhibit II and herein complained of within the State of New Jersey, and are now engaged in carrying out and intend unlawfully and unconstitutionally, by abuse of power, to attempt to carry out the provisions and enforce the prohibitions thereof without first having obtained the consent of the State of New Jersey or the people thereof, so as to deprive the State of New Jersey of that liberty in such management and self-government to which it always was and still is entitled as a free and independent State under the Constitution of the United States.

"XX. And complainant is advised, and therefore avers, that said portion in this bill excepted to of the national prohibition act of October 28, 1919, is unconstitutional and void and beyond the power of the Federal Government to enforce for all and singular the following reasons, to wit:

"(a) Because said act of Congress was enacted under and pursuant to the alleged authority purported to be conferred upon Congress in and by the alleged eighteenth article of amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which is itself null and void, as hereinbefore alleged.

"(b) Because said act of Congress prohibits and restricts the manufacture and sale in intrastate commerce of intoxicating liquors in the State of New Jersey from the time of the taking effect of said so-called eighteenth amendment.

"(c) Because the State of New Jersey has not concurred in the provisions of said national prohibition act of October 28, 1919, and if enforced without its concurrence or contrary thereto would violate, override, and nullify the rights and powers vested in and reserved to the State of New Jersey in respect to its internal and intrastate affairs and concerns under the Constitution of the United States and the amendments thereto.

"(d) Because said act of Congress interferes with and will depreciate and in a large measure destroy the taxable value of real and personal property manufactured and used in the manufacture and sale of liquor in the State of New Jersey, and is therefore destructive of free and independent government of the State of New Jersey under the people.

"(e) Because said act of Congress, by its provisions, has deprived and will permanently deprive complainant of its revenue from licenses from the manufacture and sale of spirituous, vinous, or fermented liquor, liquids, and compounds containing more than one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol by volume, amounting annually to not less than $2,442,899.46, thus depriving the

State directly and in its municipal subdivisions of a large part of the revenue necessary for the support of its State government.

"(f) Because said act of Congress, by its provisions, purports to and does interfere in the internal government of the people of the State of New Jersey, and operates to punish them by heavy fines, imprisonments, and forfeitures for violation of its provisions, thus preventing the application for licenses for sale of nonintoxicating beverages permitted under the laws of the State of New Jersey, which impairs the revenues of complainant.

"(g) Because said act of Congress, by its provisions, restricts the practice of physicians and surgeons of the State of New Jersey in the professional conduct in internal practice as regulated and licensed by complainant, and jeopardizes and menaces the health of its citizens and the rights and liberties of said physicians and surgeons in maintaining the public health, undertaking to severely punish them for violation of its prohibitions and provisions, and in the discretion of the defendant commissioner to deprive any or all of them from prescribing in their professional practice intoxicating liquors.

"(h) Because said act of Congress, by its provisions, interferes, hampers, prohibits, and restrains the complainant's employed physicians and surgeons, as well as its licensed physicians and surgeons, from their proper exercises of discretion in the treatment and prescribing for and in behalf of the wards, patients, and prisoners of the State of New Jersey in its own institutions and hospitals and those of its municipal subdivisions, and by its provisions makes it possible and provides that the license, in the exercise of the discretion of the defendant commissioner, may be refused or suspended as respects said physicians and surgeons, thus unwarrantably interfering in the internal and private affairs of said State government and making the exercise of their professional duties dependent upon the will or discretion of said defendant.

"(i) Because, in so far as it affects nonintoxicating liquors, said act of Congress is not appropriate legislation to enforce the prohibition contained in section 1 of said alleged eighteenth article of amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which is expressly confined and limited to intoxicating liquors, and because liquids denominated beer, ale, or porter, though nonintoxicating and not containing more than one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol, are by its terms prohibited.

"(j) Because said act of Congress, by its provisions, in attempting to regulate and prohibit in the State of New Jersey the manufacture and sale of nonintoxicating liquors as defined by the New Jersey Legislature, and in attempting to interfere with the regulation of the health, liberty, and property of the citizens of New Jersey, contrary to its exclusive and inherent powers of economy and police, is not appropriate legislation.

"XXI. And complainant further shows and alleges that the so-called eighteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, by section 2 thereof, provides that 'the Congress and the several States shall have concurrent power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation,' to wit, the prohibition contained in section 1 of said so-called article of amendment (Exhibit I). And complainant, not in any manner waiving its unalienable sovereign right and power to govern and control its internal affairs, and especially in respect of those sought to be ruled by said so-called eighteenth amendment, nor in any manner conceding that said amendment is valid, and protesting that said so-called amendment is an unlawful, revolutionary, and confiscatory invasion of its sovereignty, nevertheless shows: That contrary to the provisions of said section 2, and without any authority, constitutional or otherwise, Congress, by enacting the said national prohibition act, by its provisions, prohibitions, and restrictions has attempted to interfere with and encroach upon the exclusive power of the State of New Jersey to enforce said amendment intrastate, if the so-called article of amendment is valid, and the defendants have already, irrespective of the final decree of this honorable court, undertaken, and complainant is informed and believes intend, to enforce the said act, according to its terms, in the State of New Jersey, and have interfered and intend to interfere with the internal affairs and intrastate commerce of said State and thereby to override, encroach upon, and to such extent destroy complainant's powers of economy and police to the jeopardy of the welfare, health, happiness, liberty, and property of its citizens, in violation of the powers conferred by section 2 of said so-called eighteenth article of amendment; and complainant further is advised and alleges that the prohibition of the so-called eighteenth amendment is enforceable, if at all, if valid, within the State of New Jersey by its own State power, or concurrence, under its own laws in the enforcement thereof, as in this bill of complaint set forth and otherwise, and not contrary thereto, and particularly under the provisions of an act entitled 'An act to prohibit the manufacture, sale, or transportation within the State of New Jersey of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes, defining the term "intoxicating liquors," and providing for the punishment of violations thereof,' as aforesaid.

"And complainant further alleges that the power of the Federal Government by virtue of said so-called amendment, if valid, is a power to enforce said so-called amendment only so far and to the extent that the same relates to the external concerns of the United States and within the peculiar domain of the Federal Government to regulate commerce among the States, as heretofore, as distinguished from the right of the State of New Jersey, to enforce said so-called amendment intrastate, and to regulate its internal affairs, in that said alleged amendment confers on the State of New Jersey the right and power to legislate thereunder within its own borders.

"Forasmuch, therefore, as complainant is without adequate remedy at law and its only protection in the premises must arise from the powers of this honorable court, in the exercise of its original jurisdiction, the State of New Jersey respectfully prays that there be granted a writ of subpœna issuing out of this honorable court to be directed to the said A. Mitchell Palmer, Attorney General of the United States, and to the said Daniel C. Roper, United States Commissioner of Internal Revenue, the defendants herein named, demanding them and requiring them and each of them to appear and answer thereto, but not under oath, answer under oath being hereby expressly waived; and that the so-called eighteenth amendment be declared invalid, unconstitutional, usurpatory, and void; and that such portion of the national prohibition act as applies or relates to the enforcement of the so-called eighteenth amendment enacted by Congress under the assumed authority of said so-called amendment be declared unconstitutional and void, or if said so-called eighteenth amendment and the portions of the national prohibition act dependent thereon shall be found to be valid in whole or in part, or in any case, that defendants, their assistants, subordinates, agents, and servants be enjoined and restrained from enforcing such portions of the said national prohibition act in the State of New Jersey, in such manner as to interfere with the regulation of the internal affairs of the complainant, and that complainant may have such other and further relief as to this court may seem just and equitable in the premises.

"An act (H. R. 6810) to prohibit intoxicating beverages, and to regulate the manufacture, production, use, and sale of high-proof spirits for other than beverage purposes, and to insure an ample supply of alcohol and promote its use in scientific research and in the development of fuel, dye, and other lawful industries.

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the short title of this act shall be the 'national prohibition act.'

* * * * * * *

"TITLE II.

"PROHIBITION OF INTOXICATING BEVERAGES.

"SEC. 1. When used in Title II and Title III of this act (1) the word 'liquor' or the phrase 'intoxicating liquor' shall be construed to include alcohol, brandy, whisky, rum, gin, beer, ale, porter, and wine, and in addition thereto any spirituous, vinous, malt, or fermented liquors, liquids, and compounds, whether medicated, proprietary, patented, or not, and by whatever name called, containing one-half of 1 per cent or more of alcohol by volume which are fit for use for beverage purposes: Provided, That the foregoing definition shall not extend to dealcoholized wine nor to any beverage or liquid produced by the process by which beer, ale, porter, or wine is produced, if it contains less than one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol by volume, and is made as prescribed in section 37 of this title, and is otherwise denominated than as beer, ale, or porter, and is contained and sold in, or from, such sealed and labeled bottles, casks, or containers as the commissioner may by regulation prescribe.

"(2) The word 'person' shall mean and include natural persons, associations, copartnerships, and corporations.

"(3) The word 'commissioner' shall mean Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

"(4) The term 'application' shall mean a formal written request supported by a verified statement of facts showing that the commissioner may grant the request.

"(5) The term 'permit' shall mean a formal written authorization by the commissioner setting forth specifically therein the things that are authorized.

"(6) The term 'bond' shall mean an obligation authorized or required by or under this act or any regulation, executed in such form and for such a penal sum as may be required by a court, the commissioner, or prescribed by regulation.

"(7) The term 'regulation' shall mean any regulation prescribed by the commissioner with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury for carrying out the provisions of this act, and the commissioner is authorized to make such regulations.

"Any act authorized to be done by the commissioner may be performed by any assistant or agent designated by him for that purpose. Records required to be filed with the commissioner may be filed with an assistant commissioner or other person designated by the commissioner to receive such records.

"SEC. 2. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue, his assistants, agents, and inspectors shall investigate and report violations of this act to the United States attorney for the district in which committed, who is hereby charged with the duty of prosecuting the offenders, subject to the direction of the Attorney General, as in the case of other offenses against the laws of the United States; and such Commissioner of Internal Revenue, his assistants, agents, and inspectors may swear out warrants before United States commisioners or other officers or courts authorized to issue the same for the apprehension of such offenders, and may, subject to the control of the said United States attorney, conduct the prosecution at the committing trial for the purpose of having the offenders held for the action of a grand jury. Section 1014 of the Revised Statutes of the United States is hereby made applicable in the enforcement of this act. Officers mentioned in said section 1014 are authorized to issue search warrants under the limitations provided in Title XI of the act approved June 15, 1917 (40th Stat. at L., p. 217, et seq.).

"SEC. 3. No person shall on or after the date when the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States goes into effect, manufacture, sell, barter, transport, import, export, deliver, furnish, or possess any intoxicating liquor except as authorized in this act, and all the provisions of this act shall be liberally construed to the end that the use of intoxicating liquor as a beverage may be prevented.

"Liquor for nonbeverage purposes and wine for sacramental purposes may be manufactured, purchased, sold, bartered, transported, imported, exported, delivered, furnished, and possessed, but only as herein provided, and the commissioner may, upon application, issue permits therefor: Provided, That nothing in this act shall prohibit the purchase and sale of warehouse receipts covering distilled spirits on deposit in Government bonded warehouses, and no special tax liability shall attach to the business of purchasing and selling such warehouse receipts.

"SEC. 4. The articles enumerated in this section shall not, after having been manufactured and prepared for the market, be subject to the provisions of this act if they correspond with the following descriptions and limitations, namely:

"(a) Denatured alcohol or denatured rum produced and used as provided by laws and regulations now or hereafter in force.

"(b) Medicinal preparations manufactured in accordance with formulas prescribed by the United States Pharmacopœia, National Formulary, or the American Institute of Homeopathy that are unfit for use for beverage purposes.

"(c) Patented, patent, and proprietary medicines that are unfit for use for beverage purposes.

"(d) Toilet, medicinal, and antiseptic preparations and solutions that are unfit for use for beverage purposes.

"(e) Flavoring extracts and sirups that are unfit for use as a beverage, or for intoxicating beverage purposes.

"(f) Vinegar and preserved sweet cider.

"A person who manufactures any of the articles mentioned in this section may purchase and possess liquor for that purpose, but he shall secure permits to manufacture such articles and to purchase such liquor, give the bonds, keep the records, and make the reports specified in this act and as directed by the commissioner. No such manufacturer shall sell, use, or dispose of any liquor otherwise than as an ingredient of the articles authorized to be manufactured therefrom. No more alcohol shall be used in the manufacture of any extract, sirup, or the articles named in paragraphs b, c, and d of this section which may be used for beverage purposes than the quantity necessary for extraction or solution of the elements contained therein and for the preservation of the article.

"Any person who shall knowingly sell any of the articles mentioned in paragraphs a, b, c, and d of this section for beverage purposes, or any extract or sirup for intoxicating beverage purposes, or who shall sell any of the same under circumstances from which the seller might reasonably deduce the intention of the purchaser to use them for such purposes, or shall sell any beverage containing one-half of 1 per cent or more of alcohol by volume in which any extract, sirup, or other article is used as an ingredient, shall be subject to the penalties provided in section 29 of this title. If the commissioner shall find, after notice and hearing as provided for in section 5 of this title, that any person has sold any flavoring extract, sirup, or beverage in violation of this paragraph, he shall notify such person, and any known principal for whom the sale was made, to desist from selling such article; and it shall thereupon be unlawful for a period of one year thereafter for any person so notified to sell any such extract, sirup, or beverage without making an application for, giving a bond, and obtaining a permit so to do, which permit may be issued upon such conditions as the commissioner may deem necessary to prevent such illegal sales and, in addition, the commissioner shall require a record and report of sales.

"SEC. 5. Whenever the commissioner has reason to believe that any article mentioned in section 4 does not correspond with the descriptions and limitations therein provided, he shall cause an analysis of said article to be made, and if, upon such analysis, the commissioner shall find that said article does not so correspond, he shall give not less than 15 days' notice in writing to the person who is the manufacturer thereof to show cause why said article should not be dealt with as an intoxicating liquor, such notice to be served personally or by registered mail, as the commissioner may determine, and shall specify the time when, the place where, and the name of the agent or official before whom such person is required to appear.

"If the manufacturer of said article fails to show to the satisfaction of the commissioner that the article corresponds to the descriptions and limitations provided in section 4 of this title, his permit to manufacture and sell such article shall be revoked. The manufacturer may by appropriate proceeding in a court of equity have the action of the commissioner reviewed, and the court may affirm, modify, or reverse the finding of the commissioner as the facts and law of the case may warrant, and during the pendency of such proceedings may restrain the manufacture, sale, or other disposition of such article.

"SEC. 6. No one shall manufacture, sell, purchase, transport, or prescribe any liquor without first obtaining a permit from the commissioner so to do, except that a person may, without a permit, purchase and use liquor for medicinal purposes when prescribed by a physician as herein provided, and except that any person who in the opinion of the commissioner is conducting a bona fide hospital or sanatorium engaged in the treatment of persons suffering from alcoholism may, under such rules, regulations, and conditions as the commissioner shall prescribe, purchase and use, in accordance with the methods in use in such institution, liquor to be administered to the patients of such institution under the direction of a duly qualified physician employed by such institution.

"All permits to manufacture, prescribe, sell, or transport liquor may be issued for one year, and shall expire on the 31st day of December next succeeding the issuance thereof: Provided, That the commissioner may, without formal application or new bond, extend any permit granted under this act or laws now in force after August 31 in any year to December 31 of the succeeding year: Provided further, That permits to purchase liquor for the purpose of manufacturing or selling as provided in this act shall not be in force to exceed 90 days from the day of issuance. A permit to purchase liquor for any other purpose shall not be in force to exceed 30 days. Permits to purchase liquor shall specify the quantity and kind to be purchased and the purpose for which it is to be used. No permit shall be issued to any person who within one year prior to the application therefor or issuance thereof shall have violated the terms of any permit issued under this title or any law of the United States or of any State regulating traffic in liquor. No permit shall be issued to anyone to sell liquor at retail, unless the sale is to be made through a pharmacist designated in the permit and duly licensed under the laws of his State to compound and dispense medicine prescribed by a duly licensed physician. No one shall be given a permit to prescribe liquor unless he is a physician duly licensed to practice medicine and actively engaged in the practice of such profession. Every permit shall be in writing, dated when issued, and signed by the commissioner or his authorized agent. It shall give the name and address of the person to whom it is issued and shall designate and limit the acts that are permitted and the time when and place where such acts may be performed. No permit shall be issued until a verified, written application shall have been made therefor, setting forth the qualification of the applicant and the purpose for which the liquor is to be used.

"The commissioner may prescribe the form of all permits and applications and the facts to be set forth therein. Before any permit is granted the commissioner may require a bond in such form and amount as he may prescribe to insure compliance with the terms of the permit and the provisions of this title. In the event of the refusal by the commissioner of any application for a permit, the applicant may have a review of his decision before a court of equity in the manner provided in section 5 hereof.

"Nothing in this title shall be held to apply to the manufacture, sale, transportation, importation, possession, or distribution of wine for sacramental purposes, or like religious rites, except section 6 (save as the same requires a permit to purchase) and section 10 hereof, and the provisions of this act prescribing penalties for the violation of either of said sections. No person to whom a permit may be issued to manufacture, transport, import, or sell wines for sacramental purposes or like religious rites shall sell, barter, exchange, or furnish any such to any person not a rabbi, minister of the gospel, priest, or an officer duly authorized for the purpose by any church or congregation, nor to any such except upon an application duly subscribed by him, which application, authenticated as regulations may prescribe, shall be filed and preserved by the seller. The head of any conference or diocese or other ecclesiastical jurisdiction may designate any rabbi, minister, or priest to supervise the manufacture of wine to be used for the purposes and rites in this section mentioned, and the person so designated may, in the discretion of the commissioner, be granted a permit to supervise such manufacture.

"SEC. 7. No one but a physician holding a permit to prescribe liquor shall issue any prescription for liquor. And no physician shall prescribe liquor unless after careful physical examination of the person for whose use such prescription is sought, or if such examination is found impracticable, then upon the best information obtainable, he in good faith believes that the use of such liquor as a medicine by such person is necessary and will afford relief to him from some known ailment. Not more than a pint of spirituous liquor to be taken internally shall be prescribed for use by the same person within any period of 10 days, and no prescription shall be filled more than once. Any pharmacist filling a prescription shall at the time indorse upon it over his own signature the word 'canceled,' together with the date when the liquor was delivered, and then make the same a part of the record that he is required to keep as herein provided.

"Every physician who issues a prescription for liquor shall keep a record alphabetically arranged in a book prescribed by the commissioner, which shall show the date of issue, amount prescribed, to whom issued, the purpose or ailment for which it is to be used, and directions for use, stating the amount and frequency of the dose.

"SEC. 8. The commissioner shall cause to be printed blanks for the prescriptions herein required, and he shall furnish the same free of cost to physicians holding permits to prescribe. The prescription blanks shall be printed in book form and shall be numbered consecutively from 1 to 100, and each book shall be given a number, and the stubs in each book shall carry the same numbers as and be copies of the prescriptions. The books containing such stubs shall be returned to the commissioner when the prescription blanks have been used, or sooner if directed by the commissioner. All unused, mutilated, or defaced blanks shall be returned with the book. No physician shall prescribe and no pharmacist shall fill any prescription for liquor except on blanks so provided, except in cases of emergency, in which event a record and report shall be made and kept as in other cases.

"SEC. 9. If at any time there shall be filed with the commissioner a complaint under oath setting forth facts showing, or if the commissioner has reason to believe, that any person who has a permit is not in good faith conforming to the provisions of this act, or has violated the laws of any State relating to intoxicating liquor, the commissioner or his agent shall immediately issue an order citing such person to appear before him on a day named not more than 30 and not less than 15 days from the date of service upon such permittee of a copy of the citation, which citation shall be accompanied by a copy of such complaint, or in the event that the proceedings be initiated by the commissioner, with a statement of the facts constituting the violation charged, at which time a hearing shall be had, unless continued for cause. Such hearing shall be held within the judicial district and within 50 miles of the place where the offense is alleged to have occurred, unless the parties agree on another place. If it be found that such person has been guilty of willfully violating any such laws, as charged, or has not in good faith conformed to the provisions of this act, such permit shall be revoked, and no permit shall be granted to such person within one year thereafter. Should the permit be revoked by the commissioner, the permittee may have a review of his decision before a court of equity in the manner provided in section 5 hereof. During the pendency of such action such permit shall be temporarily revoked.

"SEC. 10. No person shall manufacture, purchase for sale, sell, or transport any liquor without making at the time a permanent record thereof showing in detail the amount and kind of liquor manufactured, purchased, sold, or transported, together with the names and addresses of the persons to whom sold, in case of sale, and the consignor and consignee in case of transportation, and the time and place of such manufacture, sale, or transportation. The commissioner may prescribe the form of such record, which shall at all times be open to inspection as in this act provided.

"SEC. 11. All manufacturers and wholesale or retail druggists shall keep as a part of the records required of them a copy of all permits to purchase on which a sale of any liquor is made, and no manufacturer or wholesale druggist shall sell or otherwise dispose of any liquor except at wholesale and only to persons having permits to purchase in such quantities.

"SEC. 12. All persons manufacturing liquor for sale under the provisions of this title shall securely and permanently attach to every container thereof, as the same is manufactured, a label stating name of manufacturer, kind and quantity of liquor contained therein, and the date of its manufacture, together with the number of the permit authorizing the manufacture thereof; and all persons possessing such liquor in wholesale quantities shall securely keep and maintain such label thereon; and all persons selling at wholesale shall attach to every package of liquor, when sold, a label setting forth the kind and quantity of liquor contained therein, by whom manufactured, the date of sale, and the person to whom sold, which label shall likewise be kept and maintained thereon until the liquor is used for the purpose for which such sale was authorized.

"SEC. 13. It shall be the duty of every carrier to make a record at the place of shipment of the receipt of any liquor transported, and he shall deliver liquor only to persons who present to the carrier a verified copy of a permit to purchase which shall be made a part of the carrier's permanent record at the office from which delivery is made.

"The agent of the common carrier is hereby authorized to administer the oath to the consignee in verification of the copy of the permit presented, who, if not personally known to the agent, shall be identified before the delivery of the liquor to him. The name and address of the person identifying the consignee shall be included in the record.

"SEC. 14. It shall be unlawful for a person to use or induce any carrier, or any agent or employee thereof, to carry or ship any package or receptacle containing liquor without notifying the carrier of the true nature and character of the shipment. No carrier shall transport nor shall any person receive liquor from a carrier unless there appears on the outside of the package containing such liquor the following information:

"Name and address of the consignor or seller, name and address of the consignee, kind and quantity of liquor contained therein, and number of the permit to purchase or ship the same, together with the name and address of the person using the permit.

"SEC. 15. It shall be unlawful for any consignee to accept or receive any package containing any liquor upon which appears a statement known to him to be false, or for any carrier or other person to consign, ship, transport, or deliver any such package, knowing such statement to be false.

"SEC. 16. It shall be unlawful to give to any carrier or any officer, agent, or person acting or assuming to act for such carrier an order requiring the delivery to any person of any liquor or package containing liquor consigned to, or purporting or claimed to be consigned to, a person, when the purpose of the order is to enable any person not an actual bona fide consignee to obtain such liquor.

"SEC. 17. It shall be unlawful to advertise anywhere, or by any means or method, liquor, or the manufacture, sale, keeping for sale, or furnishing of the same, or where, how, from whom, or at what price the same may be obtained. No one shall permit any sign or billboard containing such advertisement to remain upon one's premises. But nothing herein shall prohibit manufacturers and wholesale druggists holding permits to sell liquor from furnishing price lists, with description of liquor for sale, to persons permitted to purchase liquor, or from advertising alcohol in business publications or trade journals circulating generally among manufacturers of lawful alcoholic perfumes, toilet preparations, flavoring extracts, medicinal preparations, and like articles: Provided, however, That nothing in this act or in the act making appropriations for the Post Office Department, approved March 3, 1917 (39 Stat. L., pt. 1, p. 1058 et seq.), shall apply to newspapers published in foreign countries when mailed to this country.

"SEC. 18. It shall be unlawful to advertise, manufacture, sell, or possess for sale any utensil, contrivance, machine, preparation, compound, tablet, substance, formula, direction, or recipe advertised, designed, or intended for use in the unlawful manufacture of intoxicating liquor.

"SEC. 19. No person shall solicit or receive, nor knowingly permit his employee to solicit or receive, from any person any order for liquor or give any information of how liquor may be obtained in violation of this act.

"SEC. 20. Any person who shall be injured in person, property, means of support, or otherwise by any intoxicated person, or by reason of the intoxication of any person, whether resulting in his death or not, shall have a right of action against any person who shall, by unlawfully selling to or unlawfully assisting in procuring liquor for such intoxicated person, have caused or contributed to such intoxication, and in any such action such person shall have a right to recover actual and exemplary damages. In case of the death of either party, the action or right of action given by this section shall survive to or against his or her executor or administrator, and the amount so recovered by either wife or child shall be his or her sole and separate property. Such action may be brought in any court of competent jurisdiction. In any case where parents shall be entitled to such damages, either the father or mother may sue alone therefor, but recovery by one of such parties shall be a bar to suit brought by the other.

"SEC. 21. Any room, house, building, boat, vehicle, structure, or place where intoxicating liquor is manufactured, sold, kept, or bartered in violation of this title, and all intoxicating liquor and property kept and used in maintaining the same, is hereby declared to be a common nuisance, and any person who maintains such a common nuisance shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined not more than $1,000 or be imprisoned for not more than one year, or both. If a person has knowledge or reason to believe that his room, house, building, boat, vehicle, structure, or place is occupied or used for the manufacture or sale of liquor contrary to the provision of this title, and suffers the same to be so occupied or used, such room, house, building, boat, vehicle, structure, or place shall be subject to a lien for and may be sold to pay all fines and costs assessed against the person guilty of such nuisance for such violation, and any such lien may be enforced by action in any court having jurisdiction.

"SEC. 22. An action to enjoin any nuisance defined in this title may be brought in the name of the United States by the Attorney General of the United States or by any United States attorney or any prosecuting attorney of any State or any subdivision thereof or by the commissioner or his deputies or assistants. Such action shall be brought and tried as an action in equity and may be brought in any court having jurisdiction to hear and determine equity cases. If it is made to appear by affidavits or otherwise, to the satisfaction of the court or judge in vacation, that such nuisance exists, a temporary writ of injunction shall forthwith issue restraining the defendant from conducting or permitting the continuance of such nuisance until the conclusion of the trial. If a temporary injunction is prayed for the court may issue an order restraining the defendant and all other persons from removing or in any way interfering with the liquor or fixtures or other things used in connection with the violation of this act constituting such nuisance. No bond shall be required in instituting such proceedings. It shall not be necessary for the court to find the property involved was being unlawfully used as aforesaid at the time of the hearing, but on finding that the material allegations of the petition are true, the court shall order that no liquors shall be manufactured, sold, bartered, or stored in such room, house, building, boat, vehicle, structure, or place, or any part thereof. And upon judgment of the court ordering such nuisance to be abated, the court may order that the room, house, building, structure, boat, vehicle, or place shall not be occupied or used for one year thereafter; but the court may, in its discretion, permit it to be occupied or used if the owner, lessee, tenant, or occupant thereof shall give bond with sufficient surety, to be approved by the court making the order, in the penal and liquidated sum of not less than $500 nor more than $1,000 payable to the United States, and conditioned that intoxicating liquor will not thereafter be manufactured, sold, bartered, kept, or otherwise disposed of therein or thereon, and that he will pay all fines, costs, and damages that may be assessed for any violation of this title upon said property.

"SEC. 23. That any person who shall, with intent to effect a sale of liquor, by himself, his employee, servant, or agent for himself or any person, company, or corporation, keep or carry around on his person, or in a vehicle, or other conveyance whatever, or leave in a place for another to secure, any liquor, or who shall travel to solicit, or solicit, or take, or accept orders for the sale, shipment, or delivery of liquor in violation of this title is guilty of a nuisance and may be restrained by injunction, temporary and permanent, from doing or continuing to do any of said acts or things.

"In such proceedings it shall not be necessary to show any intention on the part of the accused to continue such violations if the action is brought within 60 days following any such violation of the law.

"For removing and selling property in enforcing this act the officer shall be entitled to charge and receive the same fee as the sheriff of the county would receive for levying upon and selling property under execution, and for closing the premises and keeping them closed a reasonable sum shall be allowed by the court.

"Any violation of this title upon any leased premises by the lessee or occupant thereof shall, at the option of the lessor, work a forfeiture of the lease.

"SEC. 24. In the case of the violation of any injunction, temporary or permanent, granted pursuant to the provisions of this title, the court, or in vacation a judge thereof, may summarily try and punish the defendant. The proceedings for punishment for contempt shall be commenced by filing with the clerk of the court from which such injunction issued information under oath setting out the alleged facts constituting the violation, whereupon the court or judge shall forthwith cause a warrant to issue under which the defendant shall be arrested. The trial may be had upon affidavits, or either party may demand the production and oral examination of the witnesses. Any person found guilty of contempt under the provisions of this section shall be punished by a fine of not less than $500 nor more than $1,000 or by imprisonment of not less than 30 days nor more than 12 months, or by both fine and imprisonment.

"SEC. 25. It shall be unlawful to have or possess any liquor or property designed for the manufacture of liquor intended for use in violating this title or which has been so used, and no property rights shall exist in any such liquor or property. A search warrant may issue, as provided in Title XI of public law No. 24 of the Sixty-fifth Congress, approved June 15, 1917, and such liquor, the containers thereof, and such property so seized shall be subject to such disposition as the court may make thereof. If it is found that such liquor or property was so unlawfully held or possessed, or had been so unlawfully used, the liquor, and all property designed for the unlawful manufacture of liquor, shall be destroyed, unless the court shall otherwise order. No search warrant shall issue to search any private dwelling occupied as such unless it is being used for the unlawful sale of intoxicating liquor, or unless it is in part used for some business purpose, such as a store, shop, saloon, restaurant, hotel, or boarding house. The term 'private dwelling' shall be construed to include the room or rooms used and occupied not transiently but solely as a residence in an apartment house, hotel, or boarding house. The property seized on any such warrant shall not be taken from the officer seizing the same on any writ of replevin or other like process.

"SEC. 26. When the commissioner, his assistants, inspectors, or any officer of the law shall discover any person in the act of transporting, in violation of the law, intoxicating liquors in any wagon, buggy, automobile, water or air craft, or other vehicle, it shall be his duty to seize any and all intoxicating liquors found therein being transported contrary to law. Whenever intoxicating liquors transported or possessed illegally shall be seized by an officer, he shall take possession of the vehicle and team or automobile, boat, air or water craft, or any other conveyance, and shall arrest any person in charge thereof. Such officer shall at once proceed against the person arrested under the provisions of this title in any court having competent jurisdiction; but the said vehicle or conveyance shall be returned to the owner upon execution by him of a good and valid bond, with sufficient sureties, in a sum double the value of the property, which said bond shall be approved by said officer, and shall be conditioned to return said property to the custody of said officer on the day of trial to abide the judgment of the court. The court, upon conviction of the person so arrested, shall order the liquor destroyed, and, unless good cause to the contrary is shown by the owner, shall order a sale by public auction of the property seized, and the officer making the sale, after deducting the expenses of keeping the property, the fee for the seizure, and the cost of the sale, shall pay all liens, according to their priorities, which are established, by intervention or otherwise at said hearing or in other proceeding brought for said purpose, as being bona fide and as having been created without the lienor having any notice that the carrying vehicle was being used or was to be used for illegal transportation of liquor, and shall pay the balance of the proceeds into the Treasury of the United States as miscellaneous receipts. All liens against property sold under the provisions of this section shall be transferred from the property to the proceeds of the sale of the property. If, however, no one shall be found claiming the team, vehicle, water or air craft, or automobile, the taking of the same, with a description thereof, shall be advertised in some newspaper published in the city or county where taken; or, if there be no newspaper published in such city or county, in a newspaper having circulation in the county once a week for two weeks and by handbills posted in three public places near the place of seizure, and if no claimant shall appear within 10 days after the last publication of the advertisement, the property shall be sold and the proceeds, after deducting the expenses and costs, shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States as miscellaneous receipts.

"SEC. 27. In all cases in which intoxicating liquors may be subject to be destroyed under the provisions of this act the court shall have jurisdiction upon the application of the United States attorney to order them delivered to any department or agency of the United States Government for medicinal, mechanical, or scientific uses, or to order the same sold at private sale for such purposes to any person having a permit to purchase liquor, the proceeds to be covered into the Treasury of the United States to the credit of miscellaneous receipts, and all liquor heretofore seized in any suit or proceeding brought for violation of law may likewise be so disposed of, if not claimed within 60 days from the date this section takes effect.

"SEC. 28. The commissioner, his assistants, agents, and inspectors, and all other officers of the United States, whose duty it is to enforce criminal laws, shall have all the power and protection in the enforcement of this act or any provisions thereof which is conferred by law for the enforcement of existing laws relating to the manufacture or sale of intoxicating liquors under the law of the United States.

"SEC. 29. Any person who manufactures or sells liquor in violation of this title shall for a first offense be fined not more than $1,000, or imprisonment not exceeding six months, and for a second or subsequent offense shall be fined not less than $200 nor more than $2,000 and be imprisoned not less than one month nor more than five years.

"Any person violating the provisions of any permit, or who makes any false record, report, or affidavit required by this title, or violates any of the provisions of this title for which offense a special penalty is not prescribed, shall be fined for a first offense not more than $500; for a second offense not less than $100 nor more than $1,000, or be imprisoned not more than 90 days; for any subsequent offense he shall be fined not less than $500 and be imprisoned not less than three months nor more than two years. It shall be the duty of the prosecuting officer to ascertain whether the defendant has been previously convicted and to plead the prior conviction in the affidavit, information, or indictment. The penalties provided in this act against the manufacture of liquor without a permit shall not apply to a person manufacturing nonintoxicating cider and fruit juices exclusively for use in his home, but such cider and fruit juices shall not be sold or delivered except to persons having permits to manufacture vinegar.

"SEC. 30. No person shall be excused on the ground that it may tend to incriminate him or subject him to a penalty or forfeiture from attending and testifying or producing books, papers, documents, and other evidence in obedience to a subpœna of any court in any suit or proceeding based upon or growing out of any alleged violation of this act; but no natural person shall be prosecuted or subjected to any penalty or forfeiture for or on account of any transaction, matter, or thing as to which, in obedience to a subpœna and under oath, he may so testify or produce evidence, but no person shall be exempt from prosecution and punishment for perjury committed in so testifying.

"SEC. 31. In case of a sale of liquor where the delivery thereof was made by a common or other carrier, the sale and delivery shall be deemed to be made in the county or district wherein the delivery was made by such carrier to the consignee, his agent, or employee, or in the county or district wherein the sale was made, or from which the shipment was made, and prosecution for such sale or delivery may be had in any such county or district.

"SEC. 32. In any affidavit, information, or indictment for the violation of this act separate offenses may be united in separate counts and the defendant may be tried on all at one trial, and the penalty for all offenses may be imposed. It shall not be necessary in any affidavit, information, or indictment to give the name of the purchaser or to include any defensive negative averments, but it shall be sufficient to state that the act complained of was then and there prohibited and unlawful, but this provision shall not be construed to preclude the trial court from directing the furnishing the defendant a bill of particulars when it deems it proper to do so.

"SEC. 33. After February 1, 1920, the possession of liquors by any person not legally permitted under this title to possess liquor shall be prima facie evidence that such liquor is kept for the purpose of being sold, bartered, exchanged, given away, furnished, or otherwise disposed of in violation of the provisions of this title. Every person legally permitted under this title to have liquor shall report to the commissioner within 10 days after the date when the eighteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States goes into effect, the kind and amount of intoxicating liquors in his possession. But it shall not be unlawful to possess liquors in one's private dwelling while the same is occupied and used by him as his dwelling only, and such liquor need not be reported, provided such liquors are for use only for the personal consumption of the owner thereof and his family residing in such dwelling and of his bona fide guests when entertained by him therein; and the burden of proof shall be upon the possessor in any action concerning the same to prove that such liquor was lawfully acquired, possessed, and used.

"SEC. 34. All records and reports kept or filed under the provisions of this act shall be subject to inspection at any reasonable hour by the commissioner or any of his agents or by any public prosecutor or by any person designated by him, or by any peace officer in the State where the record is kept, and copies of such records and reports duly certified by the person with whom kept or filed may be introduced in evidence with like effect as the originals thereof, and verified copies of such records shall be furnished to the commissioner when called for.

"SEC. 35. All provisions of law that are inconsistent with this act are repealed only to the extent of such inconsistency and the regulations herein provided for the manufacture or traffic in intoxicating liquor shall be construed as in addition to existing laws. This act shall not relieve anyone from paying any taxes or other charges imposed upon the manufacture or traffic in such liquor. No liquor revenue stamps or tax receipts for any illegal manufacture or sale shall be issued in advance, but upon evidence of such illegal manufacture or sale a tax shall be assessed against, and collected from, the person responsible for such illegal manufacture or sale in double the amount now provided by law, with an additional penalty of $500 on retail dealers and $1,000 on manufacturers. The payment of such tax or penalty shall give no right to engage in the manufacture or sale of such liquor, or relieve anyone from criminal liability, nor shall this act relieve any person from any liability, civil or criminal, heretofore or hereafter incurred under existing laws.

"The commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may compromise any civil cause arising under this title before bringing action in court; and with the approval of the Attorney General he may compromise any such cause after action thereon has been commenced.

"SEC. 36. If any provision of this act shall be held invalid it shall not be construed to invalidate other provisions of the act.

"SEC. 37. Nothing herein shall prevent the storage in United States bonded warehouses of all liquor manufactured prior to the taking effect of this act, or prevent the transportation of such liquor to such warehouses or to any wholesale druggist for sale to such druggist for purposes not prohibited when the tax is paid, and permits may be issued therefor.

"A manufacturer of any beverage containing less than one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol by volume may, on making application and giving such bond as the commissioner shall prescribe, be given a permit to develop in the manufacture thereof by the usual methods of fermentation and fortification or otherwise a liquid such as beer, ale, porter, or wine, containing more than one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol by volume, but before any such liquid is withdrawn from the factory or otherwise disposed of the alcoholic contents thereof shall under such rules and regulations as the commissioner may prescribe be reduced below such one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol: Provided, That such liquid may be removed and transported, under bond and under such regulations as the commissioner may prescribe, from one bonded plant or warehouse to another for the purpose of having the alcohol extracted therefrom. And such liquids may be developed, under permit, by persons other than the manufacturers of beverages containing less than one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol by volume, and sold to such manufacturers for conversion into such beverages. The alcohol removed from such liquid, if evaporated and not condensed and saved, shall not be subject to tax; if saved, it shall be subject to the same law as other alcoholic liquors. Credit shall be allowed on the tax due on any alcohol so saved to the amount of any tax paid upon distilled spirits or brandy used in the fortification of the liquor from which the same is saved.

"When fortified wines are made and used for the production of nonbeverage alcohol and dealcoholized wines containing less than one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol by volume, no tax shall be assessed or paid on the spirits used in such fortification, and such dealcoholized wines produced under the provisions of this act, whether carbonated or not, shall not be subject to the tax on artificially carbonated or sparkling wines, but shall be subject to the tax on still wines only.

"In any case where the manufacturer is charged with manufacturing or selling for beverage purposes any malt, vinous, or fermented liquids containing one-half of 1 per cent or more of alcohol by volume, or in any case where the manufacturer, having been permitted by the commissioner to develop a liquid, such as ale, beer, porter, or wine containing more than one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol by volume in the manner and for the purpose herein provided, is charged with failure to reduce the alcoholic content of any such liquid below such one-half of 1 per cent before withdrawing the same from the factory, then in either such case the burden of proof shall be on such manufacturer to show that such liquid so manufactured, sold, or withdrawn contains less than one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol by volume. In any suit or proceeding involving the alcoholic content of any beverage the reasonable expense of analysis of such beverage shall be taxed as costs in the case.

"SEC. 38. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue and the Attorney General of the United States are hereby respectively authorized to appoint and employ such assistants, experts, clerks, and other employees in the District of Columbia or elsewhere, and to purchase such supplies and equipment as they may deem necessary for the enforcement of the provisions of this act, but such assistants, experts, clerks, and other employees, except such executive officers as may be appointed by the commissioner or the Attorney General to have immediate direction of the enforcement of the provisions of this act, and persons authorized to issue permits, and agents and inspectors in the field service, shall be appointed under the rules and regulations prescribed by the civil-service act: Provided, That the commissioner and Attorney General in making such appointments shall give preference to those who have served in the military or naval service in the recent war, if otherwise qualified, and there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, such sum as may be required for the enforcement of this act, including personal services in the District of Columbia, and for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $2,000,000 for the use of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and $100,000 for the use of the Department of Justice for the enforcement of the provisions of this act, including personal services in the District of Columbia and necessary printing and binding.

"SEC. 39. In all cases wherein the property of any citizen is proceeded against or wherein a judgment affecting it might be rendered, and the citizen is not the one who in person violated the provisions of the law, summons must be issued in due form and served personally, if said person is to be found within the jurisdiction of the court.

"TITLE III.

"GENERAL PROVISIONS.

"SEC. 21. Titles I and III and sections 1, 27, 37, and 38 of Title II of this act shall take effect and be in force from and after the passage and approval of the act. The other sections of Title II shall take effect and be in force from and after the date when the eighteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States goes into effect.

"EXHIBIT III.

"An act to prohibit the manufacture, sale, or transportation within the State of New Jersey of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes, defining the term 'intoxicating liquors,' and providing for the punishment of violations hereof.

"Whereas on February 9, 1920, upon a public hearing before the joint committee of the Senate and House of Assembly of New Jersey, evidence was produced and witnesses examined in an inquiry to ascertain the intoxicating quality of certain beverages, and it was then and there established to the satisfaction of the Legislature of the State of New Jersey that beverages containing alcohol not to exceed 3½ per cent by volume were not in fact intoxicating—

"Be it enacted by the Senate and General Assembly of the State of New Jersey:

"1. It shall be unlawful for any person, firm, or corporation to manufacture, sell, or transport within this State any intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes, and any person, firm, or corporation violating the provisions hereof shall, upon conviction thereof, be punished by a fine not exceeding $100 for the first offense, and for a second offense $500, or by imprisonment not exceeding three months, as the court may direct, or both: Provided, said violation or offense shall be prosecuted only after indictment by a grand jury.

"2. The term 'intoxicating liquors,' within the meaning of this act, shall be interpreted and is hereby defined to be any alcoholic beverage containing more than 3½ per cent of alcohol by volume.

"3. This act shall not be construed and is not intended in any sense or manner whatsoever to operate impliedly as a ratification of the so-called eighteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, or in recognition of the validity thereof.

"4. This act shall take effect immediately but shall not become operative until the cessation of the present state of war, as and when proclaimed by the President of the United States.

"Approved March 2, 1920."

RECESS.

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate (at 5 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) took a recess until to-morrow, Thursday, May 13, 1920, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, May 12, 1920.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Father in heaven, in obedience with the scriptural injunction, pray without ceasing, we pray with millions and will continue to pray that Thy kingdom may come and Thy will be done in earth as in heaven.

Yet we realize that as long as men practice deceit, cheating, stealing, lying, murdering, and the despoliation of truth, the kingdom of heaven will be in abeyance; but when honesty, truth, justice, mercy shall abide in the hearts of men, the kingdom shall be ours in this life and the life to come. In Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

STANDARD FOR HAMPERS, ETC.

Mr. VESTAL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House proceed with the consideration of the bill H. R. 12350——

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Why not have a roll call on the motion?

Mr. BLANTON. I withhold the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana moves that the House proceed with the consideration of the bill which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 12350) to fix standards for hampers, round-stave baskets, and split baskets for fruits and vegetables, to establish a standard box for apples, and for other purposes.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, a point of order——

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman permit the Speaker to make a statement? The Chair would like to state that the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures has occupied two Wednesdays, and under the rule this bill can only be considered by a two-thirds vote of the House; and the question is——

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the committee has lost its place on Calendar Wednesday, and the next committee should be called.

The SPEAKER. Well, the rule is that the committee can keep its place by a two-thirds vote, and it will require a two-thirds vote.

Mr. BLANTON. Then I will withdraw the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Indiana to consider the bill which the Clerk reported by title. Does the gentleman from Texas wish to make the point of order of no quorum?

Mr. BLANTON. Not until the House divides.

The question was taken.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is in doubt.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of order there is no quorum present. It is clear that there is no quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 179, nays 113, not voting 135, as follows:

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from North Carolina rise?

Mr. SMALL. To ask unanimous consent to address the House to-morrow morning for 15 minutes after the reading of the Journal and the disposition of business on the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that to-morrow morning, after the reading of the Journal and disposition of business on the Speaker's table, he may address the House for 15 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I object.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bill of the following title:

S. 795. An act to provide for the disposition of public lands withdrawn and improved under the provisions of the reclamation laws, and which are no longer needed in connection with said laws.

AIDS TO NAVIGATION.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the roll of committees.

Mr. ESCH (when the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce was called). Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce I call up the bill H. R. 10183, the lighthouse bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin calls up, by direction of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, a bill which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10183) to authorize aids to navigation and for other works in the Lighthouse Service, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the Union Calendar. Therefore the House automatically resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Thereupon the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 10183, with Mr. MADDEN in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10183) to authorize aids to navigation and for other works in the Lighthouse Service, and for other purposes.

SEC. 2. That hereafter the salary of the Superintendent of Naval Construction in the Bureua of Lighthouses shall be $4,000 per annum.

Also, the following committee amendment was read:

Page 3, line 12, strike out "Bureua" and insert in lieu thereof the word "Bureau."

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, this bill is to take care of the Lighthouse Service. For years it has been the custom to introduce an annual bill taking care of this service, but owing to certain conditions and war emergencies we have not been able to do this during the last two years. This accounts possibly for a larger appropriation carried in the pending bill.

The section of the bill to which I wish to call particular attention is the one appropriating $5,000,000 for the construction or purchasing and equipping lighthouse tenders and light vessels for the Lighthouse Service. The main item of the bill is this item of $5,000,000, which provides for a building program for this very essential service, and in order that the House may fully understand the reasons why the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce recommended this sum I wish to give some of the details of the present Lighthouse Establishment and its present urgent needs.

There are to-day in the Lighthouse Service 117 vessels. Of these 117 vessels 54 are tenders and 63 are light vessels, making a considerable establishment. The average life of a lighthouse tender is 25 years, that of a lightship 30 years. Of the vessels now in the service, of these 117, 17 are more than 25 years old, 20 are more than 30 years old, 12 are over 50 years old, 8 are over 60 years old, and 1 is over 70. I think that statement will create an impression in your mind that there is a good deal of old material in the present establishment, and that if this establishment is to perform its functions we must reduce the average age of the vessels in the service. The idea of having 12 vessels over 50 years of age and 8 over 60 years and 1 over 70 years is not creditable.

Mr. YATES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. YATES. What is the average age now? Has the gentleman figured it up?

Mr. ESCH. Of all the vessels in the service?

Mr. YATES. Yes.

Mr. ESCH. I can not give you that, but I can state that 29 of them ought to be condemned to-day.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. By the age of a vessel does the gentleman mean the life of a vessel where it would be considered in first-class running order?

Mr. ESCH. By average age we mean the point of useful service, and when the point is passed the vessel gets less and less efficient.

Mr. BLANTON. You would not consider that the 29 ships which the gentleman says have passed that point——

Mr. ESCH. They are still in the service.

Mr. BLANTON. You would not consider that in estimating the age of vessels?

Mr. ESCH. No. The point is that when you go beyond the average age of these vessels the cost of maintenance becomes too great. There have been quite a number of losses in the last two years. In January, 1918, our lightship on Diamond Shoals, off Cape Hatteras, was sunk by a German submarine. We lost another by a collision with a barge off the Long Island coast. Another was destroyed by ice, and was never heard from. There was another lost by fire. Two have been condemned. One of those, the Gardenia, was over 40 years of age.

The Lighthouse Service demands a peculiar type of vessel; in fact, two peculiar types of vessels, the type for the tender and the type for the lightship. The two are absolutely distinct. The vessels of both types must be stanchly constructed. The tenders must be built for the work in hand. They must have large open deck space forward for the hoisting apparatus and to lodge the large buoys, which have to be placed at very dangerous points. These lighthouse tenders must be so constructed that they can handle a buoy 60 feet in length and weighing 20 tons. They must work in dangerous places and in all kinds of weather. In fact, the lighthouse tenders must go to places which other vessels shun. They must take the buoy to exposed points, to dangerous shoals, or to dangerous rocks, and oftentimes a tender must go within a few feet of the rocks. They need not have large cargo space, but they must have large deck space.

I state these facts because it may be contended here that the Lighthouse Service could have gotten vessels from the Navy, such as mine sweepers. The mine sweeper is not adapted to the work of a lighthouse tender. The mine sweeper has a large open after-deck space. The tender has an open deck space forward for its work. The mine sweeper has a high freeboard; the tender has not. There are other structural differences which make it impossible to use the mine sweeper as a lighthouse tender. We took this up with the Lighthouse Bureau, and also conferred with Admiral Strauss, who had charge of the mine sweepers in the North Atlantic. The opinion of both of these authorities is to the effect that the mine sweeper is not adapted for the purposes of a lighthouse tender, and hence we can not rely upon the mine sweeper to supply the Lighthouse Service with tenders.

The present complement of vessels is insufficient. The 117 are not adequate, not merely because of the fact that some of them are so old that they ought to be condemned to-day, but also because they are not sufficient to meet the needs now, irrespective of the increased aids to navigation which we are providing for in this bill and which must be provided for in the near future. Notwithstanding the fact that in the last 10 years the aids to navigation have increased 38 per cent, we have not had a corresponding increase in tenders or lightships. During the last nine years there have been added only 11 tenders and 7 light vessels, 18 in all. The average annual increase in the equipment of light vessels and tenders should be four vessels, two lightships and two tenders. So that in the last nine years we have hardly supplied one-half of the needs of the service. We have added in the last 10 years 3 lighthouse districts, making 19 in all; 1 for Alaska, 1 for Hawaii, and 1 for Porto Rico.

This service takes care of 47,300 miles of shore line. It takes care of 16,000 aids to navigation. Notwithstanding an increase of 38 per cent of aids to navigation in 10 years, we have not increased the number of ships necessary to take care of this increase of work. It is on that account that we are asking for this building program of $5,000,000. We have now only four more tenders than we had in 1910, and we have three fewer light vessels than we had in 1910, notwithstanding the large increase of the work of the lighthouse bureau.

We can not get these vessels from the Shipping Board. We sought vessels from that board. They had none to give. The Shipping Board does not build vessels of this type, and in fact does not build vessels of the smaller type, but builds freighters of 3,000, 5,000, 6,000, 8,000, 10,000, and 11,000 tons capacity. We could get no vessels from the Shipping Board. We could get no vessels from the Navy. That was conclusively shown by the fact that when war broke out the President ordered the turning over to the Navy of 50 vessels of the Lighthouse Service, and they remained with the Navy until war had ended. We can get, therefore, nothing from the Shipping Board and nothing from the Navy. We could not use the mine sweepers of the Navy, and so we were compelled to come to Congress and ask for an appropriation that would provide the necessary naval equipment for this service.

While these 50 vessels were under the Navy during the period of the war they were subjected to very hard service. They were kept on stations for months at a time, when they ought to have been sent to dry dock for repairs. This is another reason which places the condition of these vessels in such shape that we are compelled to make large repairs and also seek new vessels to supply the places of those which are found to be unseaworthy.

Another matter that has persuaded the committee to ask for this building program is the fact that 29 vessels out of the 117 are without power—that is, they are not self-propelling. All of them really ought to be self-propelling, and especially the lightships. And yet we find that of the lightships there are nine that have no power. Imagine a lightship upon a dangerous station blown from her moorings in a storm. A light vessel blown from her station in a time of storm constitutes a most dangerous situation. If she has no power, she can not get back to her station; if she has no power, she is at the mercy of the storm. The Navy, during the war, assigned three mine sweepers to serve as lightships. They were found inadequate for the job; two of them were blown from or were compelled to leave their stations on account of their unfitness to resist wind and heavy seas while anchored.

We ought to bring this service up to a point so that every light vessel would be supplied with its own power to enable it to get back to its station should it be blown from its station by storm. Twenty-nine, as I stated, of these vessels ought now to be condemned. They have reached the point where the cost of repairs is prohibitive. The repairs have not been kept up in the last two or three years for the reasons I have already stated; and unless repairs in a service so exacting and severe as this are kept up the service rapidly deteriorates. The building program provided in this bill, authorizing $5,000,000, is to construct 17 vessels. Of these, 13 are to be light vessels and 4 to be tenders.

Mr. YATES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. YATES. What has been done in regard to appropriations in the last few years?

Mr. ESCH. We have not had the appropriations which were authorized by the bills that were passed from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. As I stated, the last appropriation made was in 1917. In the sundry civil bill of 1919 an appropriation was made for the replacement of the light vessel off Diamond Shoals that was destroyed by the German submarine, and an appropriation was made to replace the light vessel that was lost in the ice off of Hog Island, and, I think, for one more vessel. But those three vessels which were appropriated for last year only took the places of three vessels which were destroyed, and did not provide for the then needs of the service, and certainly did not provide for the coming needs of the service. So this new program of 13 light vessels and 4 tenders is required to meet present needs and the needs for the next three years. With these new light vessels we could supplant some of the vessels that have not their own power. If we authorize $5,000,000 to carry out this building program, we will be enabled to let contracts at one time for several vessels of the same type and tonnage, and when we do that we can get lower bids. That ought to be understood by every Member of the House.

Mr. BEE. Will the gentleman from Wisconsin yield?

Mr. ESCH. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BEE. Is there a special character of vessel that can be used only for lighthouse purposes?

Mr. ESCH. Absolutely.

Mr. BEE. Obsolete war vessels and other vessels of that kind can not be utilized in the Lighthouse Service?

Mr. ESCH. They can not. We tried it with the mine sweepers and they were found defective, and two of them were blown from their stations. Now, as I stated, if we have this program, it will enable the Lighthouse Service to let contracts for this number of vessels, and by so doing we can get the vessels built at a cheaper rate. I have felt for some years that the policy of appropriating for only one vessel at a time was an unwise and wasteful policy. Should this program be authorized by the House and by Congress, the Lighthouse Service could let contracts for these light vessels, classified as they are, and get lower bids than could be obtained if we should continue the policy that has been pursued heretofore of appropriating for only one vessel at a time. We can get lower bids, because a shipyard would be more ready to offer a bid knowing that it could build two, three, four, or five vessels of the same type than if it was given a contract for only a single vessel. These vessels being of a peculiar type, shipbuilders are not so eager to put in bids, but if they know that they can have several of the same type to build they will be more ready to present their bids.

Mr. EDMONDS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. EDMONDS. I notice the appropriation here is for lighthouse tenders and light vessels. Does the gentleman mean to say that there are not boats under the control of the Navy Department or of the Shipping Board that could be used for lighthouse tenders?

Mr. ESCH. We got two vessels from the Navy, one 60 feet long and the other 48 feet long, and they are now being used by the Lighthouse Service for inner channel work. They are not usable in the open sea.

Mr. EDMONDS. It is only recently that we were notified by the Navy Department, when they came before the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, that they wished the opportunity to transfer a number of small foreign vessels that they had bought to American registry. They could be used in this service, could they not?

Mr. ESCH. Does the gentleman mean used as a light tender or as a lightship?

Mr. EDMONDS. I do not mean as a lightship, for which you say special construction is required, but a lighthouse tender is not a specially constructed ship, is it?

Mr. ESCH. The gentleman certainly did not hear my statement. A lighthouse tender must be of peculiar construction. It must have a large open forward deck, small cargo space, but a large deck, on which can be erected the hoisting derrick and tackle to handle buoys 60 feet long. Are those vessels that we are getting from Germany capable of doing that kind of work?

Mr. EDMONDS. I am not talking about vessels from Germany. I am talking about the vessels that are in the Navy Department now, that would be capable of handling this work, I should imagine.

Mr. ESCH. We have tried to get vessels from the Navy Department, as I have already stated, and all we have gotten are these two small vessels.

Mr. MILLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ESCH. I yield to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. MILLER. Of the 13 lightships to be constructed, can the gentleman from Wisconsin give some idea what vessels they are to replace, whether in the Pacific or the Atlantic?

Mr. ESCH. If the gentleman will refer to the report, he will find, on pages 4 and 5, a statement as to the location of these vessels and the names of those that they are to supplant.

Mr. CLEARY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ESCH. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CLEARY. I simply wish to suggest a reason why ordinary vessels can not do this work. If a ship or barge is sunk along the coast or in a harbor, immediately it becomes the business of the lighthouse tender to go and place a buoy to mark the sunken vessel. The lighthouse tender has to be of shallow enough draft so that she can go in any ordinary place and drop that buoy for the protection of other vessels. This can not be done by a large vessel which is not equipped for this special service. The lighthouse tenders have their derricks and equipment for the placing of these buoys, and they need to be made for that special business. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. ESCH. I thank the gentleman for his suggestion.

It may be suggested that we should defer this building program until costs of vessel construction are reduced. We thought we ought not to wait for a possible reduction in the cost of construction, because the cost of construction is likely to continue high for some years to come. Gentlemen, in the case of such great necessity it does not seem to me to be wise for the Government to defer the building program in the hope that at a distant day the cost of construction may be lowered. The need is imminent.

Do you realize that the Lighthouse Service is practically an insurance for the merchant marine and the Navy of the United States? That is what it is for. We have appropriated something like $3,600,000,000 for the merchant marine, and it may reach a total of $4,000,000,000—something over 3,000 vessels within two or three years. In 1918 we appropriated $450,000,000 for the Navy. In these two services alone we have a total appropriation aggregating four and one-half billions. All this has recently been added to the shipping of the United States, and the Lighthouse Service has got just that much more to protect. It seems to me that we can make no more profitable investment than in the Lighthouse Service, a service which is to protect the mighty merchant marine which we are now putting on the seas and these added ships of the Navy, with the thousands of men that man them, not to say anything of the thousands of vessels and their crews of other nations that come to our ports.

We certainly should not hesitate to appropriate this $5,000,000 for a building program which can be carried out in bulk more cheaply than if continued over a series of years, building one or two each year. We ought not to hesitate to carry out a plan which will add security to the shipping of the United States and our Navy and to the fleets of the world.

The other day this House appropriated $400,000 to commemorate the three hundredth anniversary of the landing of the Pilgrims. Yesterday we appropriated $450,000 for a reclamation project out West to take care of 8,000 acres used for an orchard. Here is almost a million dollars appropriated by this House in its wisdom—and I do not question its wisdom—for these things that do not affect life or property. I am asking for $5,000,000 to protect thousands of lives and billions of property. If we can appropriate for these two purposes it ought not to stagger us to appropriate $5,000,000 to protect our merchant marine and our Navy and the fleets of the world, with billions of property represented by them. These are some of the considerations which persuaded your committee to make this recommendation.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ESCH. Certainly.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Would the gentleman suggest to the House that the report of the committee is a unanimous report?

Mr. ESCH. It is a unanimous report. And I further appeal to this House to support this appropriation, because the Lighthouse Service is a service for the protection of life and property. During last year there were 111 cases where this service saved lives and protected property. With all this fine record of achievement behind it, even with lessened equipment and the crippled and aged condition of some of the vessels, we ought to come to its rescue and put it on its feet for the coming years, and when due consideration is given to these reasons I trust the House will support the committee in this building program.

I have nothing further to urge at this time, but ask that when this item is reached it will meet with the unanimous approval of the membership of the House, and that you will not be dissuaded from supporting the appropriation because of urgent appeals that will be made to you to cut appropriations to the bone. You can cut some appropriations to the bone, but in doing so you may cripple a necessary service. I contend that this is a necessary service, and that this is the last kind of service which ought to be crippled by the failure to give the appropriation that is asked for.

Mr. FREAR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ESCH. I will.

Mr. FREAR. What is the system of appropriating in other countries for this same kind of service?

Mr. ESCH. In England the lighthouse service is under the board of trade, so that it is a part of the budget.

Mr. FREAR. And it is not necessary to come up singly to the House for consideration?

Mr. ESCH. No.

Mr. LAYTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ESCH. I will.

Mr. LAYTON. I find on page 2 an appropriation for improving the aids to navigation at the entrance of Delaware Bay, $148,500. Has the gentleman any information as to the condition of the lighthouse known as the Cape Henlopen Light?

Mr. ESCH. The facts as presented to the committee are that the Cape Henlopen Lighthouse was built many years ago on a sand dune, and on account of the inroads of the sea the lighthouse will be undermined in the very near future.

Mr. LAYTON. That is my information.

Mr. ESCH. And on that account we put in this item for the construction of a lighthouse on the breakwater 140 feet in height, which will be of much greater service than the present light.

Mr. LAYTON. I am much interested in it, and that is the reason of my inquiry.

Mr. MILLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ESCH. I will.

Mr. MILLER. The bill does not carry any appropriation for the seventeenth lighthouse district, which includes Oregon and Puget Sound. I wish to state that I am in receipt of a letter from the Northwestern Towboat Association, which informs me that there is an appropriation necessary for the continuation of several lights in the Puget Sound district. I would like to ask in the light of such a communication how the committee came to eliminate any appropriation for that district.

Mr. ESCH. We took care of the seventeenth district in a prior appropriation bill, and there was no suggestion made to the committee that there was any further aid needed for the seventeenth district.

Mr. MILLER. There was no recommendation from the Secretary for the seventeenth district?

Mr. ESCH. No, sir.

Mr. HICKS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ESCH. I will.

Mr. HICKS. Coming from a seacoast district and realizing the importance of all aids to navigation, I am in sympathy with this bill. Is it not a fact that with the great increase in the merchant marine in this country, if there was ever a time when we ought to give all these aids to navigation, now is the time?

Mr. ESCH. The committee was so persuaded.

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. CROWTHER. Is it not a fact that the light vessels so far have been principally of wood construction—wooden boats?

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. CROWTHER. Those that have been built up to within a few years have been largely of wood construction?

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. CROWTHER. Is there any idea of having them in the future made of steel construction?

Mr. ESCH. Iron and steel—iron because it has a greater resisting power to salt water—as far as the hull goes. The Cross Rip light vessel, which was destroyed within the last two years by being caught in the ice off Long Island Sound, was a wooden vessel, 66 years old. She had no power of her own. She was caught in the ice and sunk, leaving no trace behind. I say that it is criminal negligence to place men on vessels of that character and subject them to such dangers. [Applause.]

Mr. CROWTHER. I want to say to the gentleman that I thank him for his statement, and I think he is right. I think it would be just as unwise to pull every block signal off a railroad as to do away with this service.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Are not the bulk of these ships now of wooden construction?

Mr. ESCH. Up to I think 10 years ago the bulk were. Under the old lighthouse board that was the policy, but since the lighthouse board was abolished and the Bureau of Lighthouses was established, they have been building them of iron and steel.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Have we many vessels now that have any auxiliary power in the way of steam or gasoline to take care of them?

Mr. ESCH. All vessels that have been constructed in recent years are self-propelling.

Mr. MONTAGUE. But only in recent years.

Mr. ESCH. I gave the number. There are 12 light vessels not self-propelling.

Mr. CLEARY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. CLEARY. It is true that wooden vessels, where they lie in salt water, become bored with these borers, and they have to be taken ashore every once in a while and have their bottoms painted and fixed over. With iron and steel vessels that is not necessary. That is an additional reason for the construction of these vessels of iron and steel. I have had losses amounting to thousands of dollars through neglect because of this. These borers would make a regular sponge of the timbers.

Mr. ESCH. The testimony before our committee given to us by one of the inspectors was that he had gone into some of the light vessels, the old wooden vessels, and with a hammer had knocked out some of the timbers.

Mr. CLEARY. That is true. They are just like a sponge.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I understand that there was some kind of an agreement made about time. I was not here, but I would like to know what it is.

Mr. ESCH. No; I have not made any statement in regard to that.

Mr. SIMS. Then I was misinformed.

Mr. ESCH. I have no objection to having the gentleman from Tennessee control half of the time. I understand that there are two hours allowed under the rule.

Mr. SIMS. I want to ask that the time be yielded to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DOREMUS], because he had charge of the lighthouse bill in the last Congress.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me hardly proper that the committee should control time on both sides, though I have no objection, if I can get some time myself. I think it is bad practice for the committee to take control of the time, for and in opposition to the bill, unless some one on the committee is actually opposed to it. The statement was made here that all the members of the committee are in favor of the bill.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LONGWORTH. If no gentleman rises in opposition to the bill, is not the debate limited to one hour?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is inclined to think it would be.

Mr. RAYBURN. If a man gets recognition, I understand that he is recognized for an hour.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I ask for recognition.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I ask for recognition.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the gentleman from Tennessee opposed to the bill?

Mr. SIMS. I am not, but I am the ranking member on the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the gentleman from Illinois opposed to the bill?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I am. I will yield to anyone on that side who is opposed to the bill.

Mr. SIMS. I would do that also, and I supposed that the gentleman from Wisconsin would yield the time.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there any gentleman on the committee who is opposed to the bill?

Mr. RAYBURN. Reserving the right to say whether I am or not [laughter], I just want to have the matter straightened out. Of course, everyone wants the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] to have all of the time that he desires, because he is very instructive at all times.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. After that, the gentleman can get any time he wants. [Laughter.]

Mr. RAYBURN. Has any precedent been established in the House in respect to the control of the time? I would like to have the matter settled.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. About the matter of the control of time?

Mr. RAYBURN. I thought under the rule that whoever got recognition was entitled to an hour.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The rule provides that there shall be two hours of general debate, one-half to be controlled by those in favor of the bill and one-half by those opposed to the bill.

Mr. RAYBURN. The gentleman should have his hour, then, under the circumstances.

Mr. STEVENSON. One-half to be controlled by those in favor of the bill and one-half to be controlled by those opposed to the bill. It does not necessarily require that the man shall speak against the bill.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I never heard that point of order raised except by the parliamentary inquiry of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH].

Mr. SIMS. I would be very glad to yield the gentleman some time if I had control of it.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I am not going to take up much time, but I want to submit an observation about this bill. I am in favor of the Lighthouse Service, and I have had a good deal to do with legislation relating to the Lighthouse Service. I have had a good deal to do with the appropriations or the authorizations made for the support of the Lighthouse Service—I think more than any other Member of either body of Congress—during a series of years.

This is the first time, I think, that there has been a general authorization to the Lighthouse Board to expend $5,000,000 for vessels without any limitation whatever as to the character of the vessel as between the two kinds—tenders or light vessels—and the cost of the vessels. This is a blanket authorization to expend $5,000,000. I am not sure, but I would like the judgment of the chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce as to whether, under this language in the bill, the Lighthouse Service would be compelled to equip all of the vessels that it started within the limitation of $5,000,000.

Mr. ESCH. I do not know that it has started any——

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Oh, no; but when it has started these. I will be more careful in my grammar.

Mr. ESCH. I think they will. The trouble has been, as the gentleman well knows, in this service——

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I know what the trouble has been, but I wanted to get at what the result is here, as to whether it is the construction of the committee under the language of the bill, which is "in accordance with the respective limits of cost hereinafter respectively set forth, which shall in no case be exceeded." Then it provides for constructing or purchasing and equipping lighthouse tenders and light vessels for the Lighthouse Service, $5,000,000. I say this is the first time such language has ever been carried in a bill of this kind, I think. Now, will this require them only to construct or purchase such vessels as shall be completely constructed and equipped out of the $5,000,000, or can they commence vessels under this and come in for more money?

Mr. ESCH. I do not think so.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Very well.

Mr. ESCH. I think the building program, as pointed out on page 4 of the report, shows exactly what they will do with the money.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Oh, well, that does not go at all. The program suggested by the Lighthouse Service to-day will not be carried out to-morrow, and has not been for 20 years, and there have been excuses for it. I am not criticizing the service in that respect. They have not built a vessel for years according to the figures which they first submitted, and the gentleman from Wisconsin and I both know that; and I am not criticizing the Lighthouse Service in that respect. Whether they ought to be criticized, I do not know.

Mr. ESCH. Of course, the gentleman realizes that the two vessels appropriated for and authorized in 1917 were never built, because one carried an appropriation of $150,000 and the other $130,000, and the bids were twice the amount of the authorization.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Yes. I realize also that what they say they propose to do now in your report does not necessarily indicate what they are going to do any more than it has in the past. They never have followed what they said they were going to do in the past; and I would say there have been good excuses. I am not saying that there are not. Here is what seems to me to be the fact: The Lighthouse Service is a great service, and ought to be maintained, and it is maintained. We have the best Lighthouse Service and the best Life-Saving Service in the world, bar none, and have had for years; and we have always been told that the vessels were old, worn out, would not last; and the gentleman from New York [Mr. CLEARY] now explains to us the reason why—that some kind of a bug, I believe they call it the teredo, although I do not know, attacks the wooden vessels and eats them up. I suppose that accounts for the fact the Lighthouse Service has one in existence that is over 70 years old, and a great many over 60 years old, and a great many over 50 years old; and I am surprised the bugs have not eaten those up in this length of time.

Mr. CLEARY. May I explain?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Certainly.

Mr. CLEARY. They take the lighthouse vessel, just like they do the rest of the boats and barges, take them in once a year temporarily and paint the bottom and fix the bottom to protect them against the teredo. With a steel and iron vessel this does not become necessary.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. They take them in and sweep off the barnacles. I am not going to discuss whether the lighthouse vessel should be wooden or steel or iron. The department will determine that. There has been some controversy about it. The best experts we ever had were in favor of the wooden vessel. I do not know whether they ought to be wood or iron. Maybe we ought to build them of aluminum; but I do not know, and no one here knows. We ought to leave that to the department that has to act. Here is the fact: We have expended enormous sums of money owing to the war in the acquisition of vessels under the Navy and under the Shipping Board and in the Army. We have got vessels to throw away; we have got vessels to burn if they were not under water; that is, we would have vessels to burn. Their hulls are below water, so you can not burn them; but we have got more vessels than we know what to do with. Now, I am familiar with the construction of lighthouse vessels and lighthouse tenders. I have been on them many times, made many inspection trips, with respect to the Lighthouse Service. It is desirable to have a special type of vessel for a light vessel. It is desirable to have a special type of vessel for a lighthouse tender, but it is not necessary at all. There are plenty of vessels now under the control of the Navy Department, the War Department, and the Shipping Board which can well be utilized for all lighthouse purposes with very little expenditure of money for their equipment, yet the Lighthouse Board does not want to do it, or the Lighthouse Service, of course. They prefer to build their own vessels. The naval constructor wants to supervise the construction of new vessels. It is perfectly natural; I do not criticize him for it. There is no service that wants to take a vessel from some other service. They always want to put in their own vessels. These lighthouse tenders went in under the Navy during the war and did the naval work. They were well enough constructed for that purpose, and equally it is true that many of the naval vessels now of no use to the Navy can go in and do the same character of work for the Lighthouse Service without constructing new vessels. Now, the committee reports that the mine-sweeping vessels of the Navy are not properly constructed either for lighthouse tenders or for light vessels. That may be true; I do not know.

They have not reported on any other character of vessels in the report, except so far as the statement made by the former Secretary of Commerce, Mr. Redfield. And I am not going to comment upon Mr. Redfield. He was a fine gentleman. He did not know much about the Lighthouse Service, but he was the finest special pleader that ever sat in this body or any other. His business, as he considered it, was to get more things for his department. He never hesitated about making a statement that was necessary to do that. They have vessels now under the Shipping Board, as I am advised, that can be well used for this purpose. Why should we go to the trouble of authorizing the construction of new vessels in order to throw away vessels that we now have? Is that common sense? There is no provision in this bill for the acquisition from the Shipping Board or the Navy of any vessels that can be utilized. Would the gentleman in charge of the bill be opposed to giving at least authority to the Department of Commerce to acquire vessels from the Shipping Board or the Navy if they can be acquired and utilized for this purpose?

Mr. ESCH. I say that we will have no objection to that. We went into that, and we thought we secured information to the effect that there were no vessels that could be used for this service.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Where is that information contained? It was not in the report.

Mr. ESCH. You will find in the hearings that Mr. Putnam states that he had applied to the Shipping Board and could get no vessels that were suitable, and that the Navy Department could not furnish any because, in fact, the Navy was asking for the lighthouse vessels.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Why, certainly, at that time. That was when he referred to. The Navy was then wanting the lighthouse vessels. They do not want them now. The Navy has got vessels to throw away, and everybody here knows it, and many of which can be easily used for this purpose.

Mr. ESCH. What type of Navy vessel can do the work of the lighthouse tender outside of the mine sweeper?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I can not tell the gentleman. If the gentleman and I became involved in the discussion of types of vessels, we would both be absolutely lost. I know what they need, in a way, for lighthouse tenders. I have been on them many times, been with them while inspecting their work, to see what they did and how they did it, in order to know so far as I could, legislatively, what they did, and I am in sympathy with the idea.

Mr. EDMONDS. I would like to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that we have got a new Secretary of Commerce now who knows something about ships, and he probably might find some.

Mr. CLEARY. I might suggest to the gentleman that the only proper way would be to have a committee appointed who understood the subject, and come to a correct conclusion regarding it.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. You could not get the committee out of Congress.

Mr. CLEARY. I did not mean out of Congress.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Not except by investigation would they understand the subject. I am not criticizing that. There ought to be some correlation of these activities between the departments. Of course a department that can come to Congress and get an appropriation for new vessels will not utilize old vessels in the hands of some other department. We are the center of these things, not the departments. We ought to require them to give consideration to these subjects before we authorize them to expend new money in new contracts for new vessels. This bill itself admits that there are vessels now constructed which may be utilized for lighthouse tenders and for light vessels which were not built for that purpose. Does not the gentleman admit that the bill says that? Because the bill authorizes the purchase of existing vessels. Never has a vessel been built for a lighthouse tender or for a light vessel specifically, and yet the bill authorizes the purchase of vessels now in existence. And if there are vessels now in existence for that purpose some of them are under the control of the Shipping Board. They are not very valuable for commercial purposes in ordinary times. So I do not think we ought to provide an appropriation of $5,000,000 to construct new vessels for the Lighthouse Service and then turn around and throw away a lot of vessels which we have already in existence and which can be used for that purpose.

I am perfectly willing to yield my time to anybody over there. If I am permitted, I will yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois yields 45 minutes.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. SANDERS] such time as he may need.

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, on Monday, April 26, I secured unanimous consent from the House to insert in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a resolution adopted by the Mississippi Valley Association, at St. Louis, on April 20, 1920, asking in behalf of the cotton producers and other cotton interests in the Mississippi Valley that no final action be taken upon the Comer amendment to the Agricultural bill without full and public hearings first being had.

It is not my purpose at this time to discuss the so-called Comer amendment. It is a measure upon which men engaged in the cotton industry differ, and therefore deserves the widest discussion before being finally acted upon. But the Comer amendment deals with a phase of the cotton industry that only arises after the crop leaves the farm. I wish to-day to discuss some of the phases of the cotton industry having to do with the cultivation of the crop and to refute some of the charges which are sometimes made against the cotton farmers of the South.

Fortunately no studied defense is required to disprove these charges. In all the range of fluctuating prices that have come to us as a result of the World War there is not another staple raw commodity that can show so small an advance as cotton. This showing at a time when all the world is crying for relief from advancing prices can be established by the official figures of the United States Government.

After the cotton has left the farm, however, this condition does not continue, but, on the contrary, figures obtained from Government sources show that once the cotton has reached the hand of the manufacturers it has been subjected to the same orgy of inflated prices that has occurred with all the other necessaries of life.

The odd feature about this matter, Mr. Chairman, lies in the fact that the advances after the cotton reaches the manufacturers is regarded as quite natural and as a thing to be expected during the prevailing period of inflation. No better illustration of this could be had than the manner in which the public received an announcement recently sent out from Baltimore dealing with the enormous advance in the wages of the textile workers who use this southern-grown cotton in the manufacture of ready-made garments. The article, which appeared in the Washington Post, said:

The lure of gold is leading some clothing workers here to disregard their health in the effort to try to make $100 a week.

Many are now making $90 a week. They are working on piecework, and have speed as well as skill. * * *

A certain sporting element enters into the contest. Those in the $90 class are trying to hit just a few dollars more than one another. The great goal is the $100 mark.

The fortunes being made in the clothing industry here are attracting workers from great distances. Some of these workers are idle, unable to find work. Even regular workers are idle, too, and insist that the $90 men are doing double work, thus causing others to be jobless.

There is nothing in this news item suggestive of the squalor and hunger and dirt once prevailing in the piece-goods trade and which inspired Thomas Hood to write his immortal lines on The Song of the Shirt.

But the money earned by the workers is as nothing compared to the profit made by the mill owners who transform the raw material into the finished product.

With a view of getting first-hand information on this phase of the industry, the men who organized the American Cotton Association recently traced certain of the shipments of raw cotton from southern points to the mills in New England and in Europe, where it is transformed into the finished product.

On one shipment of strict middling cotton that had been sold at 41 cents per pound the manufactured goods sold for $1.45 per pound; the cost of manufacturing was 22 cents, which left to the manufacturer 80 cents profit per pound. He frankly stated that he could pay a dollar a pound for cotton, basis middling, and still make a handsome profit.

How these manufacturers justify their course in charging enormous prices for their manufactured product while resorting to every expedient in their power to bear down the price to the producer is illustrated by one manufacturer, who is quoted as saying:

I frankly acknowledge that we are making an enormous and excess profit out of every pound of cotton to-day, but then we are giving the great part of these profits to the Government, and if the profits were distributed among most of the producers the Government would not get the benefit of them.

No fairer illustration of the enormous profit that is being exacted by the manufacturers could be had than the following figures, taken from the Textile World Journal, showing the range of prices of three sizes of combed yarns, taken semiannually, from June, 1914, to December, 1919. The three sizes are No. 40, 2-ply; No. 60, 2-ply; and No. 80, 2-ply:

	June.	Dec.
2-40s	$0.43	$0.38
2-60s	.55	.50
2-80s	.75	.70
1915.
2-40s	$0.40	$0.50
2-60s	.52	.65
2-80s	.72	.85
1916.
2-40s	$0.58	$0.85
2-60s	.75	1.05
2-80s	1.00	1.25
1917.
2-40s	$0.85	$0.90
2-60s	1.10	1.15
2-80s	1.40	1.45
1918.
2-40s	$1.00	$0.95
2-60s	1.25	1.20
2-80s	1.55	1.50
1919.
2-40s	$1.20	$2.50
2-60s	1.55	3.50
2-80s	2.00	4.75

Along the same line may be cited an extract from the proceedings before the Senate Committee on the District of Columbia, which recently investigated the high cost of living. The testimony disclosed the cost of the raw cotton entering into various articles of merchandise and the price at which the cotton sold in the manufactured state:

	Cost of cotton.	Cost of article.
1 piece of gingham	$0.25	$4.50
1 piece of voile	.195	3.48
1 handkerchief	.015	.25
2 pair socks	.045	.80

These illustrations of the immense increase in the price of manufactured cotton are by no means exceptional or unusual. Were it necessary to establish proof an immense array of data would be forthcoming from the official reports of our own and foreign Governments, for the same conditions have prevailed in manufacturing circles on both sides of the Atlantic. They may be summarized in a report of Ross E. Holaday, the American consul, at Manchester, England. Under date of December 31, 1919, he said:

In reviewing the Lancashire cotton market for 1919, the Manchester Guardian refers to it as "cotton's great year." "It began in gloom," the Guardian remarks, "passed on to a stage when orders were sufficiently numerous to make the Royal Exchange rather a cheerful place, and ended in such a plethora of good things that manufacturers were obliged sometimes to quote impossible prices to keep would-be purchasers at bay."

Let us compare these evidences of unprecedented prosperity in all branches of the cotton-manufacturing industry with the meager returns of the southern cotton farmer who labored with his family through 12 long months to produce his crop. The Census Bureau, in a report bearing date of November 15, 1919, announced that there were "approximately 2,000,000 growers" of cotton in this country, and the Department of Agriculture, in the Monthly Crop Reporter of December, 1919, announced that the estimated crop for the year 1919 would amount to 11,030,000 bales. This would mean an average of about 5½ bales to the family of five. The average weight of that cotton was 500 pounds to the bale, and it sold, according to the Department of Agriculture, at an average price of 29 cents per pound for lint cotton, yielding the grower what amounted to practically an advance of a quarter of a cent a pound over the previous crop, which brought an average price for the entire United States of 28.76 cents per pound.

We are thus able to ascertain from official figures how much cotton the southern people produced, the price at which they sold it, and we are equally fortunate in being able to ascertain from official figures just what it cost them to produce it. By casting up the two columns we are also able to decide whether or not the charge of profiteering can be justly laid at the door of the farmer.

When the pending annual appropriation bill of the Department of Agriculture was being prepared a few months ago, Dr. H. C. Taylor, the Chief of the Office of Farm Management, gave some interesting information on the cost of producing cotton. He was before the committee on December 19, 1919, and testified to the very exhaustive efforts that had been made by the department to ascertain the cost of producing the leading staple crops grown in this country, embracing cotton, wheat, tobacco, and sugar.

The cotton-cost studies were made during 1919 in South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, and Texas, and showed the basic elements of the cost of producing cotton on 830 farms. Wheat-cost data was obtained in Kansas, Missouri, Nebraska, Minnesota, North Dakota, and South Dakota, on approximately 650 farms. The study of the cost of producing sugar beets was obtained from about 200 farms, in Utah and Idaho. The cost of producing tobacco was studied on 150 representative tobacco farms in Kentucky, in cooperation with the State experiment station. Investigations were also conducted on 25 farms in various States of the corn belt to ascertain the cost of fattening cattle. It will therefore be seen that by far the most exhaustive tests were conducted with respect to cotton. Investigations and comparisons were made for two years—1913, immediately preceding the outbreak of the World War, and 1918, which marked the close of that great cataclysm.

For 1913 the costs were shown for 534 farms, 268 of which were operated by white men who owned their farms, and 49 by white tenants. The results were also studied of 31 negro owners and 186 negro-tenant operated farms. In 1918 there were 550 farms, 280 of which were conducted by white owners, 56 by white tenants, 48 by negro owners, and 166 negro tenants.

These figures show a wide range in the cost of production on different farms for each year. In 1913 6 farms produced cotton below 7 cents per pound, while 3 had costs above 30 cents per pound. In 1918 only 2 farms had costs of less than 13 cents per pound, while on 10 farms the costs were above 50 cents per pound. Seventeen per cent of the farms, producing 17 per cent of the cotton in 1913, had costs below 10 cents per pound, while 19 per cent of the farms, producing only 9 per cent of the cotton, had costs of 16 cents or more per pound. In 1918, 16 per cent of the farms, producing 25 per cent of the cotton, had costs under 20 cents per pound, while 16 per cent of the farms, producing only 7 per cent of the cotton, had costs of 35 cents or more per pound. In 1913 over 50 per cent of the farms produced cotton within a range of 10 to 14 cents per pound, and in 1918 50 per cent of the farms produced within a range of 20 to 30 cents per pound.

Summarizing the testimony it may be stated that a very large part of the crop was actually sold below the cost of production.

The question is now being asked, and very properly, it seems to me, Mr. Chairman, why the Government with these facts at hand did not make them public earlier and assist in putting a stop to the torrent of denunciation which has been turned upon the cotton producer by those interested in having him surrender his crop at ruinous prices.

It has been also pointed out that the Government figures are not entirely fair to the cotton growers, even as they stand. But based on the actual returns from 842 farms scattered over the South, from South Carolina to Texas, it was shown that the average cost on these farms was 28 cents per pound for lint cotton. But these farms gave a very much higher average yield than the net yield for the entire South. In this report the average yield of 842 farms selected is given at 227 pounds of lint cotton per acre, but, as a matter of fact, the average yield of the entire South in 1918 was only 155.9 pounds per acre. Where the yields were high the cost per pound was comparatively low, and where the yield was light cost was high, is the statement of the department, but that is a fact which is so well known that, as has been well stated, it hardly needed publication.

The department, basing its estimate on the return of these 842 farms, says, "The cost almost coincides with the price actually received for the crop in question, namely, about 29 cents."

Dr. Taylor gave a very careful analysis of the costs incurred during the two years under comparison. It covered an examination of the labor, fertilizer, ginning, use of land, and other costs, and showed that labor was the largest single cost connected with the growing of cotton. The labor cost in 1913 was $16.52 per acre, or 5.15 cents per pound of lint, and $34.46 per acre, or 10.79 cents per pound of lint, in 1918. The expense for the use of cotton land, including real estate overhead expense, was second in importance. This cost in 1913 was $10.44 per acre, or 3.26 cents per pound of lint, and $21.37 per acre, or 6.9 cents per pound of lint, in 1918. The cost of fertilizer was $6.11 per acre, or 1.9 cents per pound of lint, in 1913, and $9.23 per acre, or 2.89 cents per pound of lint, in 1918. Ginning amounted to 93 cents per acre, or 0.3 cent per pound of lint, in 1913, and $1.76 per acre, or 0.5 cent per pound of lint, in 1918. "Other costs," including interest, shelter, and depreciation on machinery and mules, and minor items amounted to $5.28 per acre, or 1.65 cents per pound of lint, for 1913, and $9.64 per acre, or 3 cents per pound of lint, in 1918. The total cost on these farms was $39.28 per acre, or 12.25 cents per pound of lint, in 1913, and $76.46 per acre, or 23.9 cents per pound of lint, in 1918.

These figures, Mr. Chairman, are a complete answer to any charge of profiteering that may be leveled against the cotton producer. Reduced to their final analysis, they mean that the average family of five in the cotton belt, as a result of 12 months of labor, realized approximately 5½ bales of lint cotton, averaging 500 pounds to the bale, and worth on an average 29 cents a pound, or $797.50, and 2½ tons of cotton seed with an average value of $72.65 a ton, or $181.65, making a total for the year's operations of $979.15. Against this return there was an outlay, as explained by the itemized costs I have quoted, which practically wiped out the entire receipts. Surely no fair-minded person with these facts before him would charge the cotton farmer with profiteering.

If further proof of this statement is wanted, it is to be had in the official statement of the Louisiana Crop Review for the year 1919, just issued by the United States Department of Agriculture. This interesting compilation gives the final estimates of the acreage, production, and farm values of the field crops grown in that State as compiled by the Bureau of Crop Estimates.

These official figures show that the average value per acre of the produce of the cotton farmer, based on the price of that staple on December 1, 1919, was $32.20; as against this average return of the cotton farmer, the man who allowed his land to lie fallow and gathered the wild hay realized a value per acre of $33, while those who cultivated sweet and Irish potatoes realized $103.50 and $140.80 per acre, respectively. Some of the other figures quoted of the average yields per acre are illuminating. Sorghum sirup, which is produced over a wide area in the United States, netted $116.60 per acre, while peanuts and tobacco averaged $78.74 and $282.10 per acre, respectively.

While Mr. L. M. Estabrook, Chief of the Bureau of Crop Estimates, was testifying on January 6, 1920, an illuminating sidelight was thrown on this matter of increased cost in the production of cotton. The bureau chief had been discussing all of the great staple crops of the country, and the very accurate system that the department has developed for estimating their probable yield, when one of the members from one of the Northeastern States which produces no cotton asked if the crop at "40 cents a pound is not profitable?" Mr. Estabrook replied:

Not any more so than the growing of wheat at $2.26 a bushel. The costs of production are high. The cost of picking cotton is running from 4 to 6 cents a pound. That is as much as the lint used to sell for. In those days I have myself picked cotton many times for half a cent a pound, and if anyone should have told me that I would live to see cotton picking at 4 to 6 cents a pound I would have expected to get rich at picking cotton.

Here is an increase of 1,200 per cent in the picking of the cotton alone.

In the discussion that followed around the committee table it developed that the labor for hoeing cotton had advanced to $3 a day, whereupon the Member who had started the discussion announced that in his section farm hands were getting from $10 to $12 a day for picking up potatoes for which work they had formerly been paid $2.

While the hearings developed that farm labor was the most serious problem and the most expensive factor entering into the production of cotton; an adequate supply at any figure having been impossible to obtain for harvesting the last crop, yet there had been a marked advance in all the other elements entering into the production of the crop, such as the number of horse hours required, the amount of fertilizer, manure, seeds, sacks required, the charge for ginning, insurance, taxes, machinery, overhead, and use of land. Having secured those basic factors, the department was enabled to tell with almost absolute accuracy what it cost to produce the crop. And in the face of the results no one can charge that the producers have received an unusual profit.

Not only has the cotton farmer not been a profiteer but it has only been a matter of months since he has been coming into a fair share of the fruits of his labor and the sweat of his brow. Ever since the Civil War he has been the victim of a successfully conducted propaganda to depress the price of his raw material. That word "propaganda," Mr. Chairman, is one of the terms that have come into general use as a result of the World War. While it has been a part of the wonderful vocabulary of the English-speaking people for ages, we did not hear much of it until Europe became engaged in the mighty death grapple that continued from 1914 for more than four years. Then one began to hear about and presently to have evidence of the world-wide propaganda that was being conducted by the German General Staff in Berlin as a part of the program that was to bring world dominion to the German people. Our countrymen wondered at its splendid organization, but even before we entered the World War we saw its advance halted and finally routed by the even more skillfully organized propaganda of the British.

The force that displayed this triumph of efficiency had for half a century received its principal training in systematically defeating the efforts of the American cotton farmer to better his condition. Nowhere was this better understood than in Louisiana, because the titanic struggle that for more than half a century has been conducted between the representatives of the men who grew the crop and the English spinners was upon the floor of the New Orleans Cotton Exchange. We of Louisiana have been able to see with our own eyes the methods pursued by the powerful financial interests which finally succeeded in making the great staple crop of the South come to be known as "Misery cotton."

We began to see daylight, Mr. Chairman, when after long wandering in the wilderness of defeat the Democratic Party was returned to power. Among the first of its wholesome acts was to pass the farm loan act and the Federal reserve act, which enabled the small farmers to get financial relief without cringing before the International Money Trust, which was in league with the International Spinning Trust, and receiving small financial favors at ruinous rates of interest.

These achievements have come as a result of organization growing out of war conditions, and the cotton growers of the South realize as never before the necessity of maintaining organization in the future if they are to hold what they have already secured and are to successfully evade the assaults that are yet to be expected from the forces that have always preyed upon them.

These precautions are necessary. The British spinners have, in fact, fired the first shot. Consul General Skinner reported from London under date of January 22, 1920, that the Empire cotton-growing committee, appointed in July, 1917, "to investigate the best means of developing the growing of cotton within the (British) Empire, and to advise the Government as to the necessary measure to be taken for this purpose," has made known to the board of trade the results of its investigations. After stating that there is evidence of a world shortage of cotton, and that there is no prospect whatever of there being a full supply of cotton for some years to come; that the prices of cotton are in excess of anything recorded since the cotton famine in the sixties, the report points out—

That the shortage of cotton affects the whole world.

That the British Empire is specially affected.

That the cotton industry is, in many respects, the most important British industry.

That the shortage of cotton is most marked in those finer kinds which, for reasons explained, constitute the chief requirements of the British mills.

That the British cotton industry draws four-fifths of its supplies of cotton from the United States, and that it is dangerous to be so largely dependent on the climatic vagaries of one portion of the world. It is also noted that the United States is, year by year, requiring for its own consumption an increasing proportion of its own crops.

That experience shows that in many parts of the Empire the growing of cotton is or could be made exceedingly profitable to the country growing it. Egypt, the Sudan, Uganda, and some of the West Indian Islands are named.

But the cotton industry of the South, which has at last recovered from the harrowing conditions that hung over it for decades following the Civil War, is now eager to measure swords with the spinners. While the British are attempting to cultivate cotton fields in the dominions that they have established all over the earth, the people of the South are establishing looms in the fields already producing cotton at home. It is going to be the greatest industrial battle the world has ever seen, and the men of the South will have foemen worthy of their steel, but no one who is familiar with the history of achievement in the South, and who appreciates the resources at her command, can have any doubt of the result.

The magic wand of wealth is now touching the American cotton fields wherever the fleecy staple is grown. Only a few days ago the newspapers carried an announcement that the Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co. is investing $30,000,000 in 40 acres of factory buildings in Los Angeles simply to be near the supply of long-fiber cotton grown in that section of California.

This announcement is only typical of the announcements daily appearing in the public press and bears out the statement of the Census Bureau relative to the growth of the American cotton industry which has just been made public. It publishes a table showing the activity of the American cotton spindles from 1840 to 1919, and adds:

The most significant fact brought out by this table is the rapid growth of the industry in the cotton-growing States. In 1880 there were only 561,360 active cotton spindles in these States, and the quantity of cotton consumed was 188,748 bales. In 1919, 14,846,239 spindles were operated, and the quantity of cotton and linters consumed in 1918 was 4,414,052 bales. Between 1900 and 1918 the consumption in these States almost trebled, while in the New England States it increased 38.4 per cent, and in all other States 42.6 per cent. The consumption in 1900 in the cotton-growing States amounted to 39.3 per cent of the total for the country, compared with 49.3 per cent for the New England States and 11.4 per cent for all other States. For the year ending July 31, 1918, the consumption in the cotton-growing States formed 57.4 per cent of the total for the country, that in the New England States 34.4 per cent, and that in all other States 8.2 per cent. Of the total number of spindles operated during 1919, 42.5 per cent were in the cotton-growing States, 51.7 per cent in the New England States, and 5.8 per cent in all other States.

The prosperity of a people is measured by their balance of trade. When they are creditors it means that the other peoples of the earth must pour gold into their coffers to settle for the products of their fields and factories. It is the economic ambition of every nation to be in the creditor class, and it is the proud distinction of the United States to be at the very head of that class. Many factors have contributed to that distinction, but perhaps the principal reason is that our exports are made up of well-balanced cargoes of raw materials from our fields, our forests, and our mines as well as the finished material of our factories. Most of the other important commercial people confine their exports largely to manufactured goods.

How commanding has become our position in the trade of the world has been graphically summarized in the statement recently issued by the Department of Commerce reviewing the foreign commerce of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919.

It points out that the commerce of the United States with foreign countries during the year ending June 30, 1919, amounted to $10,329,000,000, consisting of imports of $3,096,000,000 and exports of $7,233,000,000. The commerce of the last fiscal year, it says, has been in many respects phenomenal. Our exports and our imports of merchandise and the excess of exports over imports were the largest in the history of the country. The imports exceeded any prewar year by about 65 per cent and the exports were larger by about 195 per cent. The imports were $150,000,000 greater than the preceding year. The exports were $1,310,000,000 greater, and the excess of exports over imports exceeded the preceding year's excess by $1,160,000,000.

From the time of the declaration of war until the signing of the armistice the monthly exports averaged about $500,000,000, but with the coming of the armistice, which made possible the discontinuance or modification of war-time restrictions on trade and released an increasing amount of shipping space employed by military forces, and the large output of American shipyards, the exports became larger and larger, until June, the last month of the fiscal year, when they were reported at $928,000,000. For the six months' period from January to June the monthy average exceeded $676,000,000.

The report, proceeding to show how our export trade has grown by leaps and bounds, continues:

Perhaps a better understanding of the magnitude of our export trade during the fiscal year 1919 and the remarkable growth brought about by the war may be had when it is realized that the average monthly exports during any fiscal year had never reached $100,000,000 prior to 1898, and that the $200,000,000 monthly average was not attained until the fiscal year 1913. For a few months after the beginning of the European war our export trade was adversely affected, but the business of supplying belligerent countries with munitions soon expanded enormously, and the first time that the $300,000,000 mark was passed was in September, 1915. Five months later $400,000,000 was reached. The $500,000,000 mark was exceeded in August, 1916; $600,000,000 in January, 1917; $700,000,000 in April, 1919; and, finally, the total of $928,000,000 was reported for June, 1919.

When we analyze the factors that have contributed, over a long period of years, in building up the overseas commerce of the United States to the preeminent position it presently occupies, we realize that cotton more than anything else has contributed to that prosperity. During the past five years, while Europe was converted into one vast armed camp, while helpful industry was paralyzed, and the world witnessed the greatest slaughter and destruction it has ever seen, the preeminence of cotton was not so marked. During that period our every energy was strained in forwarding munitions of war and foodstuffs to sustain the embattled hosts, whose far-flung lines stretched across Europe from the North Sea to the shores of Asia. But even during that period, when so many looms and spindles were idle, our cotton shipments easily continued to occupy the first place among raw materials exported. This is illustrated by the report for the fiscal year 1919, which shows that of the $1,226,485,683 value of such goods, raw cotton to the amount of 5,353,895 bales, valued at $873,579,669, constituted the lion's share. In the preceding year, out of a total of $897,324,090, cotton amounted to $665,024,655.

But when we consider the additional sums that we derived from the sale of our manufactured cottons, the oil and the meal that was yielded by the seed, and all the additional by-products of this wonderful plant, the sum is enormously increased. Thus, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, we exported unmanufactured cotton of all kinds to the amount of $904,753,000; manufactures of thread and yarn to the amount of $7,201,000; bleached, unbleached, dyed, and printed cloths to the extent of $35,347,000; handkerchiefs and mufflers amounting to $6,947,000; laces, veils, and nettings to the amount of $117,533,000; plushes, velvets, hosiery, and wearing material to the amount of $93,542,000; making a grand total of manufactured cottons amounting to $261,466,000. Cottonseed oil was shipped abroad to the value of $45,172,000, but owing to the disarranged conditions of shipping following the armistice there was a total absence of our usual lucrative trade in cottonseed cake and meal. The figures here given, however, show a grand total of cotton and its by-products in the manufactured and unmanufactured state aggregating $1,211,391,000 exported for the year ending June 30, 1919.

In conclusion, I desire to call the attention of all the country to the fact that it is just as important that the South be prosperous as it is that any other section of the Union be wealthy. The prosperity of the South is largely dependent upon the price obtained by it for its chief product, cotton. A prosperous South makes a growing market for the products of North and East and West, and the Nation as a whole is therefore directly interested in the price obtained by the South for its great crop.

The tremendous volume of cotton and its products that we export keeps the balance of trade safely in our favor, and a fair price realized by the southern farmer for his product wonderfully enhances his value as a purchaser of the products of the rest of the Union.

So intimately entwined are all our activities and all our commercial relations that it is to the interest of every section of these United States to see that every other section is prosperous, and I feel and believe that the people of the North and the East and the West are to-day gratified in the knowledge that prosperity and peace and plenty have come to our section of the Union.

Many a year we have struggled against adverse conditions and adverse surroundings, but our people have ever had before them the thought that some day they, too, would share in the general prosperity of the Nation. That day seems to have dawned for us, and the only one who objects to the South receiving a fair price for its great product is he who puts his own selfish gain above the welfare of all the people of our country.

I want you to know that we rejoice in the prosperity and the wealth that has come to every section of the Union, and we feel that all of our fellow Americans rejoice with us in the prosperity that now seems assured to the Southland. [Applause.]

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the rest of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Constructing or purchasing and equipping lighthouse tenders and light vessels for the Lighthouse Service, $5,000,000.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I am constructively occupying the time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will call the gentleman's attention to the fact that this bill is being read by sections.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. This bill has always been read by paragraphs.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not a general appropriation bill.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I understand.

Mr. ESCH. That has been the uniform practice.

The CHAIRMAN. By paragraphs?

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, to come after the sum on line 11.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. MANN of Illinois: Page 1, after the figures in line 11, insert: "Provided, That the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, and the Shipping Board shall report to the Secretary of Commerce such vessels as they are willing to dispose of and which by reasonable alterations can be used for light vessels or lighthouse tenders, and if the use of the vessels should be justified by the necessary expenditure for alterations, transfer of the ships shall be made to the Department of Commerce and they shall be used for the purposes of this act, and the appropriation herein shall be available for such repairs and be reduced by the sums saved by the use of such vessels."

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, that amendment was prepared by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EDMONDS]. I notice it says at the end of the amendment, "the appropriation herein." There is no appropriation, and I ask to have that changed to the "sum herein authorized."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment as it is asked to be changed.

The Clerk read as follows:

Modified amendment: After the figures on line 11 insert: "Provided, That the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, and the Shipping Board shall report to the Secretary of Commerce such vessels as they are willing to dispose of and which by reasonable alterations can be used for light vessels or lighthouse tenders, and if the use of the vessels should be justified by the necessary expenditure for alterations, transfer of the ships shall be made to the Department of Commerce and they shall be used for the purposes of this act, and the sum herein authorized shall be available for such repairs and be reduced by the sums saved by the use of such vessels."

Mr. ESCH. I gather from that that the Secretary of Commerce would be the judge as to the alterations of such vessels as might be in the possession of the Shipping Board and also those which might be in the possession of the Army and the Navy?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. That is the idea; and the language of the bill is that "The Secretary of Commerce is hereby authorized to establish, provide, and improve the following aids to navigation," so that there will be no possible question as to the authority.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Purchasing site and constructing and equipping a lighthouse depot for the seventh lighthouse district, $250,000.

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BRIGGS: Amend the bill by adding, on page 2, between lines 19 and 20, the following: "Eighth lighthouse district: Improving Galveston Jetty light station, Tex., including fog-signal station, $6,500."

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, this is a fog-signal station to which I referred on the floor of the House here a day or two ago, when the sundry civil bill was under consideration and with reference to which something of a discussion arose as to whether there was sufficient authorization for its construction under existing law. The original provision for the construction of a light and fog-signal station on this south jetty at Galveston was contained in the sundry civil bill of 1896, and additional provision was carried for that purpose in the bill for 1908. The light station has been completed, but the fog signal has not been; in fact, they have been unable to do anything toward the installation of a compressed-air fog signal.

The value of commerce that is flowing through Galveston Harbor to-day is estimated at about $800,000,000 a year. That was approximately the figure for the year 1919. Those jetties project out into the sea about 6½ or 7 miles and in foggy weather it is oftentimes necessary to hold ships in port until the fogs clear for want of this signal. The pilots and commercial association of Galveston have been urging me to have provision made for adequate fog warnings. The Bureau of Lighthouses in the Department of Commerce has recommended the fog signal as urgent and deserving the appropriation. I understand that the chairman of this committee has no objection, and surely the safety of the great ships and their enormously valuable cargoes should not be longer jeopardized by failing to provide this safeguard of commerce.

Mr. ESCH. I understand that this is to install a compressed-air fog signal?

Mr. BRIGGS. Yes; to install a compressed-air fog signal.

Mr. ESCH. And it is in group No. 1 of the recommendations of the Lighthouse Service?

Mr. BRIGGS. Yes; in group 1.

Mr. ESCH. I have no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

TWELFTH LIGHTHOUSE DISTRICT.

Improving aids to navigation and establishing new aids at Ludington, Mich., $50,000.

Mr. BEE. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman a question. I notice nothing in the bill with reference to the lighthouse at Port Aransas, and I also read the hearings, and there was nothing said there about that lighthouse. The reason why I was specially interested in it was that they had a very severe storm at that point last December, and I visited it shortly afterwards, and this lighthouse had withstood the storm, but at the same time it indicated that it needed some repairs to it in the foundation. But I notice neither in the report nor in the hearing anything in reference to it.

Mr. ESCH. I think that might be carried or covered by the item on page 2, second paragraph—

Riprap to reinforce foundations and to protect them from damage by sea and ice and make more accessible boat landings at certain light stations, $134,000.

Mr. BEE. That probably would cover it.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I also suggest that if it is for the repair of a lighthouse, it is not necessary to go into this bill. It is covered by the appropriation bill.

Mr. BEE. That is the information I wished to get. I am obliged to the gentleman. I saw the lighthouse. It was the only building that stood after that storm, that lighthouse at Port Aransas.

Mr. ESCH. That was the storm of September, 1919?

Mr. BEE. Yes; at Corpus Christi.

Mr. ESCH. There was very serious loss throughout the entire Gulf coast, and many of the buoys were carried away, and some of the riprap around the lighthouses was damaged.

Mr. BEE. That will be covered by the appropriation?

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. MANSFIELD. At Port Lavaca, near the point spoken of by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BEE], they had some little towers for lights, on the bay there, for the benefit of the fishing and oyster craft. They have no light there at this time at all, and the bureau claims that there is no appropriation at present available for that purpose. Is there anything in this bill to authorize that?

Mr. ESCH. If they stated it required a separate appropriation, this bill would not reach it, because we have no such item, and no such item was brought to the attention of the committee. If it is thought that the needs of navigation are such as to require their installation, I have no doubt the committee might give it favorable consideration, but it has never been presented.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That hereafter the salary of the superintendent of naval construction in the Bureau of Lighthouses shall be $4,000 per annum.

With a committee amendment, as follows:

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Chairman, the bill now under consideration has for its purpose the authorization of aids to navigation and for other works in the Lighthouse Service.

The total amount of authorization carried by the bill for various projects and items amounts to $5,791,000. The amount of authorization contained in the first bill introduced in this Congress on this subject, House bill 6499, was $6,503,400.

The difference in the amounts of authorizations in the two bills is largely due to the appropriations made in the sundry civil act of July 19, 1919, and the first deficiency appropriation act, fiscal year 1920, approved November 4, 1919.

Your committee was of the opinion that the authorizations contained in this bill were necessary in order that the work in connection with the Lighthouse Service might be effectively managed and performed and that the projects to be undertaken were necessary for the proper preservation of life and property.

I am of the opinion that serious objection will not be made by any Member of the House to any of the authorizations in this bill, except possibly as to the items for constructing or purchasing and equipping lighthouse tenders and light vessels for the Lighthouse Service in the sum of $5,000,000.

The items comprised in the authorizations in the bill outside of this particular item amount to $791,000.

At the outset, then, I will call the attention of the House to the first item in the bill, found on the first page, which is as follows:

Constructing or purchasing and equipping lighthouse tenders and light vessels for Lighthouse Service, $5,000,000.

This particular item contemplates a building program of 17 vessels at an estimated cost of $5,130,000. From careful estimates and examinations as to the condition and further serviceability of vessels of the Lighthouse Service, it is found that within the next five years 18 lighthouse vessels and 10 tenders should be replaced with vessels of the types indicated, as shown by the report that accompanies the bill, and one light vessel should be built for a new station.

As it will require under favorable conditions from two to three years after appropriation is made before vessels are available for service, it appeared to your committee that funds should be provided now for 17 vessels most urgently needed, in addition to three vessels for which estimates have been heretofore submitted, two to be built under the authorizations of June 20, 1918, and one to replace Diamond Shoal light vessel.

An itemized statement of the additional vessels and the estimated cost of each, the authorization of which is now deemed necessary by your committee, will be found in the report which accompanies the bill.

In the nine years since 1910 but 11 tenders and 7 light vessels have been built, a total of 18, or only one-half the number of replacements necessary to maintain the service on a uniform basis without allowing for any increase.

According to statements made to your committee during the hearings held on this bill, it was disclosed that in order to maintain a fleet of 54 tenders and 63 light vessels an average of 2 tenders and 2 light vessels must be built each year.

During the last nine years 36 vessels should have been constructed to meet ordinary conditions. Instead, only 16 have been built, or less than one-half the number of replacements necessary to maintain the service on a uniform basis.

The building program proposed in this bill will simply do that which should have been done during the last nine years.

During the war the vessels of the Lighthouse Service were wholly under the control of the Navy Department. The aids which the navigation service maintains has increased since 1910 from 11,660 to 16,000, or an increase of about 38 per cent. Three new districts have also been added—Alaska, Porto Rico, and Hawaii.

The number of gas buoys which the tenders must maintain have increased from 225 to 600, the number of automatic shore lights have increased from 117 to about 600. The present depleted fleet in the Lighthouse Service is thus required to do at least 38 per cent more work than before.

I also call the attention of the Members of the House to the fact that this country has the most extensive Lighthouse Service in the world; that the service covers 47,300 miles of general coast line and rivers; that at the present time the Lighthouse Service employs 117 vessels, of which 54 are tenders and 63 light vessels.

It is necessary for these vessels to keep up the most continuous and extensive patrol of the coasts of the United States.

In speaking of the service of these vessels, the Commissioner of Lighthouses in his annual report to the Secretary of Commerce, stated in part:

No vessels are exposed to more severe usage than the vessels of the Lighthouse Service. The tenders are continuously on the go, handling buoys of great weight in proportion to the size of the vessel, as well as large quantities of coal and other supplies, and in working buoys must navigate close to the edges of reefs and shoals, in waters which other vessels shun. The light vessels must remain at anchor in exposed positions off the coast during the most severe gales and hurricanes. The handling of buoys and supplies must often be done in a seaway under difficult or dangerous conditions.

The United States is making a very large investment in shipping. The total amount authorized or appropriated by Congress for the Emergency Fleet Corporation to October 15, 1918, was $3,671,000,000, covering the purchase and construction of over 3,100 vessels, or more than double the total number of seagoing merchant vessels of the United States at the beginning of the war.

I also wish to call the attention of the House to the fact that the expenditures of the Navy Department for the construction of new vessels for the one fiscal year 1918 were about $450,000,000. It is important that the great investment that the Government has in shipping and the vessels in connection with the Navy Department should and must be amply protected. The privately owned shipping of this country and the shipping of other countries which visit our shores should and must be protected.

It also appeared in the hearings that the useful life of a lighthouse tender is about 25 years and a light vessel about 30 years under normal conditions. The average age of the vessels of the Lighthouse Service is at present for tenders 22 years, for light vessels 28 years, and for each class this average has increased by three years since 1914, owing to the lack of replacement of vessels.

Of the light vessels now in use, 20 are more than 30 years old, and of the tenders 17 are more than 25 years old. Some of the light vessels are over 50 years old. From the foregoing it appeared plain to your committee that in order to maintain 54 tenders and 63 light vessels with a useful life, as stated above, it was evident that, on an average, two tenders and two light vessels must be built each year to maintain the service on a uniform basis, without allowing for any increase.

According to the report of the Commissioner of Lighthouses to the Secretary of Commerce:

The deficiency of vessels in the Lighthouse Service has been much accentuated by an unusual number of casualties in the last year and a half. Since January, 1918, Diamond Shoal light vessel has been sunk on station by a German submarine; Cornfield Point light vessel has been run into by a barge and sunk on station; Cross Rip light vessel has been destroyed by the ice; Thirty-five Foot Channel light vessel has been destroyed by fire at a contractor's dock; and Bush Bluff light vessel and the tender Gardenia have been condemned as worn out and not worth repair.

All of the tenders of the Lighthouse Service excepting one were, by order of the President, placed on duty with the Navy Department during the period of the war, and during this time, from April, 1917, to July, 1919, have been performing various duties for that department in addition to doing their regular lighthouse work. Some of this naval duty, such as the handling of protection nets, has been strenuous work for these vessels. As a result of this, as well as the shortage of tenders and the difficulty of effecting repairs under war conditions, there has unavoidably been an unusual deterioration of vessels.

I also call attention of the House to the fact that no appropriation for lighthouse vessels has been made since the act of June 12, 1917, or more than two years. Due to war conditions and insufficiency of appropriations, no new contracts for lighthouse tenders have been made since September, 1915, and since June, 1916, only one light vessel has been contracted for.

The question naturally arose as to whether or not vessels could be obtained from other sources to perform useful service in connection with the Lighthouse Service.

The commissioner in his annual report has the following to say upon this subject:

Very thorough investigation has been made as to the possibility of obtaining vessels suitable for work of the Lighthouse Service from the Shipping Board or from vessels no longer needed by the Navy on account of the cessation of the war. It was found that the Shipping Board had no vessels in any way suitable. From the Navy two small vessels have been transferred, which will be used for shoal-water tender work, but they will be of but limited usefulness. Lighthouse tenders and light vessels are both vessels of unusual requirements, and it is impracticable to meet the special needs of this work by adapting vessels built for other purposes.

I also call attention to the statements made by Commissioner Putman, of the Lighthouse Service, in a letter written to Chairman ESCH on December 11, 1919, in regard to this subject, which is in part as follows:

In reply to your letter of December 10 I beg to state that the possibility of utilizing the Navy type of mine sweepers for vessels for the Lighthouse Service was considered last year immediately after the armistice, officers of this service inspecting these vessels and examining their plans, and it was concluded that their design differed so fundamentally from the main requirements for either lighthouse tenders or light vessels that they would not be serviceable for either purpose, and that the cost of adapting them, if that were practicable, would be out of proportion to their future usefulness. This opinion has been confirmed by conference on the subject which I have had to-day, after receipt of your letter, with Admiral Strauss, who was in charge of the recent mine-sweeping operations in the North Sea, and who further informs me that all of our naval vessels used in these recent operations were of the new type above referred to.

2. The fundamental difficulty in this matter is that the mine sweepers are a very special type of vessel designed for efficiency in that particular work, and that buoy tenders and light vessels are also very specialized vessels of unusual type, and that there is great risk to the crews and property and loss of efficiency in attempting to utilize unsuitable vessels on these exacting and dangerous duties of the Lighthouse Service.

3. The first requirement of a lighthouse tender is a large, open deck space forward for the handling of buoys, moorings, etc. The Navy mine sweepers have the upper works carried well to the bow and the hull lines narrowed toward the bow, leaving practically no deck space available for buoy work; they have large deck space aft for handling mines, but this space is not useful for handling buoys and moorings, and on a buoy tender should be utilized for quarters, etc. Other extensive alterations would be necessary, and the cost of the structural changes would be very large.

4. The Navy mine sweepers in no way conform to the requirements for light vessels. Their size would only justify their use on the more exposed stations. Their high and exposed upper works, sharp lines forward, and mooring from a high deck make them dangerous vessels to attempt to keep anchored in exposed stations in the open sea off the coast. Their unsuitability for this purpose was proven by actual trial, for shortly after the armistice the Navy Department placed a number of these vessels on stations off the Atlantic coast as temporary lightships, in addition to those of the Lighthouse Service, to facilitate the return of transports, and much difficulty was experienced with them because of their unsuitability of design for this special service. In a number of cases in severe weather these vessels were compelled to leave their stations and seek port, a condition which could not be tolerated with regular light vessels, whose continued presence on station in severe weather is of the highest importance to the safety of lives and property.

The lighthouse tenders and the light vessels used in connection with the Lighthouse Service must be constructed along well-defined lines in order to be useful in the Lighthouse Service.

Your committee consequently was of the opinion that it was absolutely necessary for the Government to build vessels especially adapted to the Lighthouse Service.

In support of this particular item of five million in the bill, I wish to call attention to the statement made by Secretary Redfield during the hearings, which is, in part, as follows:

There is one point which I wish especially to emphasize, and that is that in order to maintain a fleet of 54 tenders and 63 light vessels an average of 2 tenders and 2 light vessels must be built each year, and this has been the constant recommendation of the department. In the 9 years since 1910, however, but 11 tenders and 7 light vessels have been built, a total of 16, or only one-half the number of replacements necessary to maintain the service on a uniform basis without allowing for any increase. But on the other hand, not only have we had this serious naval work to do, the vessels being throughout the war wholly under the control of the Navy Department, but since 1910 the number of aids to navigation which the service maintains has increased from 11,660 to over 16,000—a total of 4,415, or 38 per cent—and 3 new districts, Alaska, Porto Rico, and Hawaii, have been added; and, furthermore, the number of gas buoys which the tenders must maintain has increased from 225 to 600, and the number of automatic shore lights from 117 to about 600. So that with a depleted fleet, which has been replaced at but half the former rate, we are called upon to do 38 per cent more work than before.

In addition to that, I need hardly to remind this committee of the great increase in our own fleet, which brings upon us a correspondingly heavier responsibility. I think it is hardly necessary for me to add anything to that except this word: From six and one-half years' experience with these vessels and these men, the force of seamen which this service maintains is all but unique. These men know our shores as nobody else knows them. They live in intimate, daily contact with all the dangers of our coasts. They should have the finest and safest types of vessels for the work. I am sure it would be your desire that the equipment should be fully up to the merits of the service and the quality of the men that command them. These ships are as valuable for war as for peace and invaluable alike in both.

The bill that we are now considering is simply an authorization for aids to navigation and for other works in the Lighthouse Service. It will be necessary for the Appropriation Committee to go over the authorizations provided in this bill and make such appropriations as may be deemed necessary to meet the exigencies of the situation which will, in their judgment, be deemed wise and proper, taking into consideration the enormous expenditures which have been made and must of necessity be made to properly conduct governmental affairs during the period of reconstruction through which we are now passing.

I realize that it is necessary for the American Congress to practice economy. However, in practicing economy I do not believe that it is wise to neglect the Lighthouse Service to such an extent that it will cripple that service so that it can not be efficiently managed and performed, for it has to do largely with the preservation of life and property.

As to the other items in the bill, I especially call your attention to the report that accompanies the bill, for in each instance I believe that the purposes and the necessity for the same are fully and amply set forth.

I believe that, taking all matters into consideration, the House should pass this bill just as it has been reported by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with the amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. BLANTON. A division, Mr. Chairman. We want a record.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 36, noes 0.

So the motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MADDEN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 10183) to authorize aids to navigation and for other works in the Lighthouse Service, and for other purposes, had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put the amendments in gross. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill as amended.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. ESCH, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, before we take up this other bill, which is a very important matter, I think we ought to have a quorum present, and I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. It is clear that there is no quorum present.

Mr. ESCH. I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, when the following Members failed to answer to their names:

LEAVE TO EXTEND REMARKS.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD remarks on certain postal conditions.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on postal conditions. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

AQUEDUCT BRIDGE.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce I call up the bill (H. R. 10328) to amend an act approved May 18, 1916, entitled "An act to provide for the removal of what is known as the Aqueduct Bridge, across the Potomac River, and for the building of a bridge in the place thereof."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin calls up a bill which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the Union Calendar. The House automatically resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. HICKS] will please take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 10328, with Mr. HICKS in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the first section of an act approved May 18, 1916, entitled "An act to provide for the removal of what is known as the Aqueduct Bridge, across the Potomac River, and for the building of a bridge in the place thereof," be amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 1. That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to cause to be constructed a bridge across the Potomac River at or near what is now known as the Aqueduct Bridge, replacing said bridge with a substantial structure, at a total cost for the bridge and the necessary approaches thereto of not more than $2,100,000."

With the following committee amendments:

Page 1, line 3, after the word "first," strike out the word "section" and insert in lieu thereof the words "and fourth sections." Page 2, after line 4, insert:

"SEC. 4. That the sum of $150,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of securing proper plans and for the payment of any lands, easements, rights, or property necessary in the construction of said bridge: Provided, That the plans and specifications herein authorized shall be so drawn and prepared as to insure the construction of a bridge and approaches thereto within the limit of cost of $2,100,000 as fixed herein. The Secretary of War shall advise with the Commission of Fine Arts in regard to the location, plans, and specifications of said bridge and approaches. As soon as the plans and specifications are approved the Secretary of War shall give public notice of the specifications and invite competitive bids for the construction of the bridge and approaches thereto according to the specifications, reserving the right to reject any and all such bids."

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this bill is to increase the authorization for the construction of the bridge across the Potomac River at Georgetown. The original bill appropriating for this purpose $1,000,000 was carried by the act of May 18, 1916.

In January or February, 1917, bids were submitted for the construction of the bridge under the plans prescribed by the War Department after conference with the Fine Arts Commission, but the bids that were so submitted were considered excessive, and the Secretary of War concluded he would build the bridge on his own account and employ the necessary help.

Owing to war conditions and a scarcity of labor and the increased cost of materials, it has been found impossible to complete this bridge under the original estimate of $1,000,000. The pending bill is to increase the authorization from $1,000,000 to $2,100,000, based on a careful estimate submitted to the committee by the Chief of Engineers.

The status of the work to-day is approximately as follows: The work is about 40 per cent completed. All the subaqueous work has been completed, and all piers are above water except one. A large portion, if not all, of the structural steel required is on hand, and a good portion of the lumber required for forms is on hand, as are also the barges and tow equipment. So that there is now required possibly 50 per cent more to complete the structure, 10 per cent being represented by equipment and material now on hand.

Mr. JUUL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ESCH. I will.

Mr. JUUL. I want to ask why we do not find in this bill the usual formula that the District is to pay one-half of the cost of construction?

Mr. ESCH. Because that is contained in the act of May 18, 1916, the original act. The original act says that the District shall pay one-half, so that it was not necessary for us to repeat it.

Mr. JUUL. But you are appropriating an additional amount of money. Is not it necessary that in this bill making this additional appropriation you should provide that the District should pay one-half?

Mr. ESCH. I do not think so, in view of the fact that this bill only amends two sections of the original bill.

Mr. JUUL. Of course, I would yield to the gentleman's superior knowledge.

Mr. ESCH. I do not claim any superior knowledge, but that is my construction of it.

Mr. JUUL. How can the provision in the original bill be carried over to limit this appropriation when nothing is said in the bill about it? In other words, the provision in the original bill only refers to the amount appropriated in the original bill. If the gentleman says it is all right, I suppose——

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ESCH. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I would say to the gentleman from Illinois that this bill is not an appropriation, it is an authorization. The gentleman may recollect that a few days ago we passed a bill carrying an appropriation of $500,000 for this bridge with language which amply meets the criticism of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. JUUL. If the gentleman from Virginia will permit, you have in the original bill an appropriation of a certain amount of money, and you put in a limitation on the amount that the Government is to pay. Now you come in with this bill and provide for a larger amount of money, but there is no provision such as is in the other bill.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The same limitation applies to this sum.

Mr. JUUL. There is nothing in this bill which says that the limitation is to affect this. I ask the gentleman in all fairness how the provision in the original bill can affect this?

Mr. MONTAGUE. There is nothing in this bill except the existing law, as stated by the chairman of the committee, a provision that covers the objection raised by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. JUUL. The gentleman would not state as a good lawyer and as the ex-governor of a State that that is so.

Mr. MONTAGUE. As a member of the committee and an ordinary lawyer, I think that is so. [Laughter.]

Mr. JUUL. The gentleman is a good lawyer, but I do not think this would cover it.

Mr. YATES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. YATES. I have read the testimony in this case, and there was testimony by Maj. Taylor, I think.

Mr. ESCH. He has charge of the work.

Mr. YATES. He made a statement that unless this authorization was passed at once or very soon, it might create additional expense to the United States.

Mr. ESCH. Yes; but it has been taken care of currently by an appropriation of $150,000 in one of the deficiency appropriation bills recently passed and $500,000 carried in the sundry civil bill passed the other day. I do not know that these appropriations could have been made had anyone raised the point of order, because the original bill contained the limit of cost.

Mr. YATES. I was not driving at that so much as to the urgent necessity for making the authorization.

Mr. ESCH. He has money enough to continue the work. He has a balance on hand to-day of something like $62,000 out of the $150,000 appropriated in a deficiency appropriation bill; but it is necessary to have funds immediately in order to keep the work going.

Mr. BROOKS of Pennsylvania. Is the bridge being built by contract?

Mr. ESCH. No; by the Government, by day labor.

Mr. BROOKS of Pennsylvania. No cost-plus arrangement?

Mr. ESCH. No; not at all; it was to avoid the necessity of that form of contract that the Government is doing it itself. Now, in order to justify this doubling, practically, of the appropriation based on the original estimate, I wish to call attention to some increases of cost of materials between the period of the first appropriation and now.

Cement a barrel cost, January, 1917, $1.30; at present it is $2.40. Lumber per thousand January, 1917, cost $21 to $45, and at present it is $45 to $70. Steel January, 1917, was 3 cents a pound and now it is 4 cents. Coal was $3.50 a ton and at present it is $6.45. Crushed stone in January, 1917, cost $2.90, and to-day it is $3.80. Common labor per diem January, 1917, was $1.75 and to-day it is $4.

Labor conditions, Maj. Taylor informed the committee, were somewhat better now than last year, but the efficiency is not as good as it was some time ago. With the amount of the appropriation authorized in this bill he is confident that the bridge can be constructed.

As gentlemen know, it is wholly within Federal jurisdiction, because both the District terminal and the Virginia terminal are on Government lands. That, of course, reduced the cost of the right of way on the Virginia side. The bridge will serve a very needed purpose, and it would be indeed a foolish thing if we left it in its present uncompleted condition, subject to deterioration of the structure, as well as deterioration of the materials now on the ground. Every reason in the world justifies the completion of this very necessary structure at the very earliest convenient date. It is the most used highway between the District of Columbia and Arlington and Fort Myer, both of them Government properties. For these reasons the committee was persuaded that we should approve an authorization increasing the original amount from $1,000,000 to $2,100,000.

I reserve the remainder of my time and yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE].

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, I do not think any statement is needed in addition to that made by the chairman of the committee. The report of the committee for this increase and authorization is unanimous. The question is very simple. There was a necessity for the bridge, as is demonstrated by the act of 1916, which authorized its construction. The existing bridge has become very unsafe. Once, and perhaps oftener, traffic has been suspended. Repairs have been made on the piers, but it has been discovered by the engineers that those repairs have been inadequate and in the nature of things can not be made adequate, that there is no way out except a new bridge. The Congress appropriated $1,000,000 for the bridge. No contract was let. The Engineers of the Government undertook to construct this bridge, and they submitted plans and specifications which called for nine hundred thousand and odd dollars, which was a conservative estimate and well within the range of prices of material and labor. The extraordinary rise in the cost, as shown by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH], necessitates this additional authorization. Therefore the question is, Shall the Government lose the money that has been expended and fail to meet the dire necessities of the situation, or appropriate the supplementary sum of $1,000,000 to complete the work, and thus meet the requirements and necessities of the Government?

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Yes.

Mr. LAYTON. Is it a fact that if this matter is not attended to right away, if you delay for a year or two while the country's finances are in the condition they are, there will be any loss by depreciation?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, I will state to the gentleman, as by his question he clearly anticipates, there will be a loss. There will be depreciation in material, and in the plant, and there will be wastage generally.

It will be bad economy to wait for a better day. It is good economy to do the work now. This House appropriated $500,000 a few days since in the sundry civil bill to be credited on this $1,000,000 authorization, showing that the House appreciated thoroughly the necessity for the continuation of the construction.

Mr. LEA of California. Mr. Chairman, I use that bridge to some extent, and it will be necessary to make extensive repairs if this bridge does not replace the old one shortly. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. LAYTON. I rose to ask the question only because as a Member of Congress it seems to me that we are all of us interested in the very serious situation which confronts us in respect to national finances. If it is imperatively necessary that this work should be done because of industrial, agricultural, or other interests, and there will be a loss if it is not done, then, of course, it is a matter that should be voted. I am interested only in the matter of economy.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I can sincerely answer in the affirmative the questions which the gentleman has propounded. It is an obviously economical thing to do, and an obvious necessity that it should be done. I agree with the gentleman, and I hope my votes now and hereafter will show that I favor the exercise of every practical economy by the Government until we are upon a thoroughly sound financial basis again. [Applause.] I should not have concurred in this report if I did not believe this additional authorization a most pressing need.

Mr. PARRISH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Yes.

Mr. PARRISH. I notice that this act is amendatory of an act approved May 18, 1916.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Yes.

Mr. PARRISH. I understand that in that act it is provided that the District of Columbia shall bear one-half of the cost of this bridge. Will the act be left so that the District will pay one-half of this additional authorization?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Oh, yes; I think there is no doubt that the limitation as to the proportionate obligation on behalf of the District and the Federal Government will remain as it is. We do not amend that limitation, but leave it just as it is. Section 6 of the act to which the gentleman from Texas refers provides that one-half of the entire expense of constructing this bridge and its maintenance when constructed, including the amount appropriated in section 4 of the act, shall be paid by the District of Columbia. Then there is another provision in the act which I may mention, that the traffic carried by electric lines and street railways shall likewise pay some proportion of fares and charges to the Government.

Mr. PARRISH. I understand that both ends of this bridge rest on public land.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Both ends of the bridge rest on land owned by the Government of the United States.

Mr. LAYTON. In other words, the original act, in so far as the provisions which the gentleman has quoted are concerned, will not be affected by this amendment calling for an increase of money.

Mr. MONTAGUE. This act that we are now considering does not touch section 6 of the original act. That remains in full force; it will be an existing portion of this bill if enacted.

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Yes.

Mr. JUUL. I wanted to state to the gentleman that I am not speaking in an unfriendly way on the subject, for I am for the bill——

Mr. MONTAGUE. I appreciate the gentleman's attitude.

Mr. JUUL. I think the present bridge is a disgrace and that we ought to have a new one.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I am more concerned about its danger than its disgrace.

Mr. JUUL. The gentleman knows that later legislation supersedes legislation of an earlier date?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Yes.

Mr. JUUL. Here comes a piece of legislation that not in the slightest degree refers to section 6 of the original act, which places a limitation on the former appropriation. There are a number of very good lawyers in this country who would no doubt claim that as the legislation now proposed makes no reference to the section limiting the former appropriation, therefore this legislative body had not in mind that section 6 had application also to this added appropriation.

I want to ask the gentleman if it would not be fair to people who are worried about this matter to accept an amendment stating that the restrictions of section 6 should have reference to it. I can draw the amendment in five minutes——

Mr. MONTAGUE. Personally I have no objection. If the gentleman does not misconstrue me to be discourteous, I think it is mere surplusage; but I have no objection.

Mr. JUUL. I am not so sure it is surplusage.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I have respect for the gentleman's opinion; I have just expressed my own.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Will the gentleman allow me to make a suggestion to my colleague?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Certainly.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. If this bill passes in the form it is in, it only changes two sections of an act now upon the statute books. It goes in as a part of that statute, under our practice a new law, and all the rest of the sections remain in force applicable to the new or newly amended sections.

Mr. JUUL. I bow with deference to the greater learning of my distinguished colleague from Illinois, but I want to tell the gentleman that here is a legislative proposition that comes in and provides for a specific sum of money without restriction. Now, the great question that is involved in this legislation is whether or not it was the intention of this legislative body that any part of the former legislation restricting the legislation in the former bill should apply to legislation that is passed years after?

The gentleman well knows that if there is any doubt on a proposition that the later legislation would govern, of course. I bow with the deepest humility to the greater learning and far greater experience of the gentleman from Illinois, but I have seen questions exactly like this debated and the older legislation lost out in every instance.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. JUUL. I hope we can get enough time to settle this matter. It is a matter of a million dollars.

Mr. ESCH. I will yield the gentleman five minutes.

Mr. TILSON. Before the gentleman starts, will he yield for a question?

Mr. JUUL. Certainly.

Mr. TILSON. May I make this suggestion to the gentleman from Illinois, that if we pass this bill as it stands it will be equivalent to rewriting the entire law. It will be the same as if the entire law were carried in this particular bill, including these two sections that are here carried, and there could be no object, no good purpose served by reinserting legislation that already is in effect. This is simply adding some amendments to two sections of a law that is already in force.

Mr. JUUL. Now, I want to ask the gentleman a question, and I hope he will answer it loud enough so that gentlemen will hear it. Does the gentleman mean to tell me that a restriction placed by a legislative body in a bill 2, 4, or 10 years ago will restrict the present Congress when no mention is made in the present bill that the limitation shall apply?

Mr. TILSON. If it is carried in the law which remains in effect, certainly. The law will remain in effect with this restriction in it, because when other sections are inserted which do not specifically repeal the restriction, it remains in full force and effect. As I said in the beginning, it is the same as if we were reenacting the entire act, including any restrictions, together with these new amendments in it.

Mr. JUUL. There is no line in the former bill restricting the appropriations of this Congress.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JUUL. I will if I have time.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The gentleman has five minutes.

Mr. JUUL. When do the five minutes start?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The strongest case, of course, will be provisions creating crime?

Mr. JUUL. Yes.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. And it is the constant practice, and sustained by the court, where a certain section of a statute provides that a violation of other sections of the statute shall be crimes or misdemeanors if Congress should amend some of the other sections of the statutes and put in new provisions without saying anything about the change of the penal provision, yet that relates back to the time you changed the law providing for new duties?

Take the interstate commerce act, for instance. It has been amended a great many times since I have been in this House with old penal provisions still applicable and many new provisions inserted in their place in the law without saying anything about it.

Mr. JUUL. Will the gentleman yield in my time? I want to know from the distinguished gentleman from Illinois what harm could come to this bill by placing in it an amendment stating that the bill now before us should be subject to the limitations of section 6 of the former act?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Well, the harm that can come is largely a matter of form. Here is a section supposed to go in by this amendment as though it were originally written in the former bill, and to say in that that it shall be subject to another section of the same act supposedly in force, it seems to me, looks as though Congress did not know what it was doing.

Mr. JUUL. But you are appropriating a new amount of money——

Mr. MANN of Illinois. No; we are not appropriating here at all. This is only an authorization. There is no appropriation here by this bill.

Mr. JUUL. I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back half a minute.

Mr. ALMON. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. ALMON. To ask the Chairman a question. If work was suspended on the bridge would it not necessarily result in great deterioration and waste of the material?

Mr. ESCH. Yes, sir. That is clearly presented to us by Maj. Tyler, not so much in the concrete abutments but in the structural steel that is now on hand, and in the lumber.

Mr. ALMON. And would not the Government suffer considerably by the organization becoming disorganized, and would they not have to build up another organization later on?

Mr. ESCH. Yes; that is true. And if nothing is done we will have to store the material and hire watchmen.

Mr. ALMON. To say nothing of the danger of the old bridge.

Mr. ESCH. If there is no further discussion, Mr. Chairman, I ask for the reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to ask the gentleman if there is any Member who desires to speak in opposition to the bill?

Mr. ESCH. There has been no further request for debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the first section of an act approved May 18, 1916, entitled "An act to provide for the removal of what is known as the Aqueduct Bridge, across the Potomac River, and for the building of a bridge in the place thereof," be amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 1. That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to cause to be constructed a bridge across the Potomac River at or near what is now known as the Aqueduct Bridge, replacing said bridge with a substantial structure, at a total cost for the bridge and the necessary approaches thereto of not more than $2,100,000."

Also the following committee amendments were read:

Page 1, line 3, after the word "first," strike out the word "section" and insert in lieu thereof the words "and fourth sections."

"SEC. 4. That the sum of $150,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of securing proper plans and for the payment of any lands, easements, rights, or property necessary in the construction of said bridge: Provided, That the plans and specifications herein authorized shall be so drawn and prepared as to insure the construction of a bridge and approaches thereto within the limit of cost of $2,100,000 as fixed herein. The Secretary of War shall advise with the Commission of Fine Arts in regard to the location, plans, and specifications of said bridge and approaches. As soon as the plans and specifications are approved the Secretary of War shall give public notice of the specifications and invite competitive bids for the construction of the bridge and approaches thereto according to the specifications, reserving the right to reject any and all such bids."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. BLANTON. I move to strike out the last word. I wanted to ask the chairman of the committee why it is necessary to provide a possible expenditure of $100,000 for the purchase of easements or condemnation of property in order to build this bridge? There is already sufficient easement where the old bridge is, is there not?

Mr. ESCH. That has already been done. There was a separate appropriation of $150,000 for providing for plans and for architect's fees and for the purchase of necessary land—lands on the Georgetown side. These lands were occupied by buildings, and those buildings were torn down and the cost deducted from the appropriation of $150,000. There is something of that appropriation not yet expended.

Mr. BLANTON. How much of this $2,100,000 is payable by the District of Columbia?

Mr. ESCH. Half of it is payable by the District of Columbia.

Mr. BLANTON. How much is payable by the other side of the river?

Mr. ESCH. Nothing. That is Government property.

Mr. BLANTON. The other side of the river is owned by the Government?

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. It is a military reservation——

Mr. ESCH. That is my recollection.

Mr. BLANTON (continuing). And the numerous citizens of Virginia who live just outside of that military reservation and get the benefit of this $2,100,000 bridge, who enjoy driving over it without stopping the speed of their fine automobiles, pay nothing?

Mr. ESCH. There is no method that I know of to secure a contribution on the part of the State of Virginia.

Mr. BLANTON. I will state to the distinguished chairman of this committee that down where I live, when a bridge is built across a stream, say between two counties, on a county line or near a county line, where the people of one county enjoy the privileges of it almost as much as the people of another, both of those counties come in and jointly stand the expense of building that bridge. They pay the fiddler when they dance down in my country. And it does occur to me that these people over in Virginia who are to profit by the building of this $2,100,000 bridge should come in and share a part of the expense, at least, with the Government of the United States and with the District. Has not the gentleman ever considered that phase of the matter?

Mr. ESCH. The question was presented, of course, at the hearings, and I think some explanation was made by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MOORE], who introduced the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. The bill was introduced by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MOORE], I take it?

Mr. ESCH. I think that would be proper.

Mr. BLANTON. The Virginia people are pushing this?

Mr. ESCH. I think there is no denying the fact that the citizens of Virginia will avail themselves of the bridge, but it also reaches Fort Myer and Arlington. There are a great many governmental agencies across the river, like Arlington, and Fort Myer, and the Arlington Radio Station.

Mr. CANNON. Can you suggest any provision by which the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] and the gentleman in charge of the bill, and myself, say, could be made to contribute?

Mr. BLANTON. We contribute all the time. We are contributing every day that we stay here. If the gentleman will just go over into Virginia and try to buy something, he will contribute all right.

I want to ask the distinguished chairman one other question. The gentleman has heard of what they call the million-dollar bridge on Connecticut Avenue, I am sure?

Mr. ESCH. Yes; it was built some years ago.

Mr. BLANTON. Is it true that the Government paid a million dollars for that bridge?

Mr. ESCH. I do not know. Some member of the District Committee could give that information, no doubt.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. It is worth it, if they did.

Mr. BLANTON. Did we pay that?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I think so.

Mr. BLANTON. I was riding over that bridge some time ago with one of my constituents, who happens to be an expert engineer, and I remarked the fact, with a good deal of pride and gratification, that that bridge cost a million dollars. It is something Congress did—not the Sixty-sixth Congress, but some previous Congress; you know other Congresses have done something for the people besides the Sixty-sixth Congress—and I remarked that the Government paid a million dollars for that bridge, and he wanted to look it over, and he did look it over, and he said, "Well, if the Government did pay a million dollars for that bridge, in my judgment, somebody got rich on it."

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Well, I will say that probably there was never the slightest suspicion of anybody in connection with the construction of the Connecticut Avenue Bridge. It is a wonderful piece of engineering work. I doubt whether it could be duplicated to-day for $2,500,000.

Mr. BLANTON. Everything now has gone up.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I do not know now who the commissioners were when that bridge was constructed, although I understand they have their names on it.

Mr. BLANTON. Does not the gentleman from Illinois believe that the people of Virginia should pay something toward this bridge?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I think they should, but I am sure they will not. [Laughter.] I will make a suggestion to the gentleman from Texas along these lines:

People from Virginia are always asking for a new bridge, not one to replace one that has gone but a new one. They used to want one to be called a "memorial bridge" on the plea that it would be a reconciliation between the North and the South, to cost $5,000,000. They want one now as a memorial for the soldiers who died in the recent World War. Let us stand together and not let them have all the bridges that they want, but let us have the bridges that are necessary. They have to use them, and we can not stop it. There is no practical way.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman from Virginia—all of them, in fact, the entire delegation—are such big men and generous men and men of such good judgment [applause] and know so well what is right and proper that I want to ask the Chairman if he does not think that if he would put a little amendment on this bill to the effect that a certain per cent, say, at least 10 per cent, of the cost of this bridge should be borne by the interested parties in Virginia, these gentlemen from Virginia, as I am sure they would, would get busy and see to it that Virginia comes in and does what she ought to do and pays 10 per cent, or whatever proportion may be decided upon?

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. JUUL. Would the gentleman insult the great State of Virginia by asking them to put up only 10 per cent?

Mr. BLANTON. I want to appeal to them in such a way that they will not turn the appeal down.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. The facts are these: The bridge rests at both ends on land belonging to the Government of the United States, and even if there were no community known as the State of Virginia it would be absolutely necessary in the interest of the United States and of the District of Columbia to have the bridge. A great deal of the produce that arrives in the District will come over it. A great deal of the travel southward from the District of Columbia will go over it.

Mr. BLANTON. Does the gentleman believe that Virginia ought not to bear any part of this expense?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I do not believe Virginia should pay any part of the expense.

Mr. BLANTON. Then I withdraw my suggestion. I have such confidence in the distinguished gentleman from Virginia. [Applause.]

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. A minute more. I want just to make one other remark. There has been allusion to a memorial bridge. Frankly speaking, at some time in the future I hope to see such a bridge built. I understand the only pending bill providing for the construction of a memorial bridge was offered in the Senate by a Member of the Senate from the far West, who thinks that there should be built across the Potomac a Lincoln-Lee memorial bridge. The suggestion is made in that way, and not by the State of Virginia or anyone representing the State.

Now, this particular bridge, called the "Aqueduct Bridge" sometimes and the "Key Bridge" sometimes—and it seems we are about to call it the "Georgetown Bridge"—will replace a bridge that has been in use for many, many years, and the new structure, as has been stated, is an absolute necessity. The bad condition of the old structure creates a situation that must be dealt with promptly and with sufficient liberality.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Would the gentleman from Virginia have any objection to naming this the "Memorial Bridge," and thereby save $5,000,000?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Really, I am more interested in the substance of the thing than, so to speak, in the shadow represented by the name.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Let us call this the "Memorial Bridge," and thus save the $5,000,000 required by the other bridge.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I do not oppose the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], so far as the name is concerned. Perhaps, however, it would not be a mistake to give the bridge the name adopted by the War Department in honor of the author of the Star-Spangled Banner. Or it has occurred to me that it might very properly be called the "George Mason Bridge," in honor of a great statesman who has no monument here. I think Mr. Mason once owned the land at the south end of the bridge. But such is my anxiety to see the bridge completed that I leave to other gentlemen—very cheerfully leave to them—the matter of determining how the bridge shall be designated.

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I do not think I have the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] has the floor.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I am identified with the gentleman from Texas in a very pleasant way by the manner in which he acquiesces in my desire. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLANTON. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. TINCHER. Just recently, at this session of Congress, a bill was passed providing for a bridge in Kansas on a military reservation, and it was so worded that in my judgment the Secretary of War can require the local people to put up a certain amount of money before constructing that bridge or defer its construction. I agree with the gentleman from Virginia that on these reservations the Government should build bridges, and I am going to vote for your Virginia bridge; but I simply want to ask the gentleman if he will not realize the fact that the people of Kansas and Virginia are on a par, and exercise his good influences on the Secretary of War to have him go ahead with the construction of that bridge in Kansas without levying tribute on the citizens of Kansas?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I am inclined to make a tentative bargain with the gentleman right away. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment again.

The amendment was again read.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, there is another amendment to be reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk informs the Chair that the other amendment has already been reported.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I will take the Clerk's word for it, that it has been reported. I did not mean on the original reading of the bill, but under the five-minute rule. I was waiting for it to be read in order to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 8, before the word "that" and after the quotation marks, insert "Section 1."

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The other amendment has been reported and the question is on that amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, at the end of line 4, insert the following: "the bridge herein authorized to be constructed shall be known as the Georgetown Bridge."

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, that conforms to the action taken by the House the other day.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise, report the bill with amendments to the House with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HICKS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 10328) to amend an act approved May 18, 1916, entitled "An act to provide for the removal of what is known as the Aqueduct Bridge, across the Potomac River, and for the building of a bridge in the place thereof," and had instructed him to report the same back with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment?

There was no demand for a separate vote.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended.

On motion of Mr. ESCH, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

WAR-RISK INSURANCE ACT.

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce I call up the bill H. R. 13558, for the purpose of improving the facilities and service of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, and of further amending and modifying the war-risk insurance act, as amended.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa calls up the bill H. R. 13558, which is on the Union Calendar. The House automatically resolves itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the gentleman from New Jersey, Mr. LEHLBACH, will take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. LEHLBACH in the chair.

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

Mr. CANNON. I think it ought to be read.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Bureau of War Risk Insurance is hereby authorized to establish throughout the United States and its outlying possessions such regional offices, not exceeding 14 in number, and such suboffices as may be deemed necessary in the best interests of the work committed to said bureau.

That there is hereby appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated the sum of $1,000,000 for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this section.

SEC. 2. That under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury and the Postmaster General may prescribe, the Postmaster General is hereby authorized to receive the war-risk insurance premiums and act for and turn over to the Secretary of the Treasury the money so received, and also he is authorized to receive and transmit to the Bureau of War Risk Insurance applications for reinstatement of lapsed or for converted insurance. In making such collections he is hereby authorized to use postal money orders, postal notes, war-risk insurance coupons, or any other method of collection which may be deemed most expedient and satisfactory.

SEC. 3. That a new section is hereby added to article 2 of the war-risk insurance act as amended, to be known as section 212 and to read as follows:

"SEC. 212. The family allowance shall be awarded and paid to any person or persons within class A for the full period defined in section 204 hereof, or for such part of said period as it shall be shown that the necessary relationship existed between such person and an enlisted man in the active military or naval service, in cases where deductions from the pay of the enlisted man for compulsory allotment have not been made but the family allowance was applied for during the service of the enlisted man, notwithstanding the fact that such enlisted man has died in or been discharged from the service: Provided, That compulsory allotment has not been waived or that exemption therefrom has not been heretofore or shall not be hereafter granted. Any awards or adjustments heretofore made which are inconsistent with the provisions of this section may, upon application, be reopened and made to conform herewith."

SEC. 4. That section 313 of the war-risk insurance act as amended is hereby amended by adding thereto, immediately following subsection (2) thereof, a new subsection, to be known as subsection (2a), and to read as follows:

"(2a) That the Bureau of War Risk Insurance is hereby authorized to pay the beneficiary or other person or persons in whose name an action may have been commenced or prosecuted fees and mileage, the same as is now paid and allowed to witnesses in the United States courts, in going to, remaining at, and returning from place of trial, and without any regard to whether the action, if any, is brought or prosecuted in a court of the United States or some other court.

"In all cases of assignment of causes of action under this section, whether the assignment be heretofore or hereafter made, where it shall appear to the director to be to the best interest of the beneficiary so to do, the director, acting for and in the name of the United States, may assign the cause of action back to the beneficiary or to his personal representatives."

SEC. 5. That the Bureau of War Risk Insurance shall relieve from the payment of premiums on renewable term insurance the following persons, to wit: (a) Those who are receiving hospital care under said bureau, during the period they are receiving such care; (b) those who are receiving vocational training pursuant to the vocational rehabilitation act, during the period of such training; and (c) those who are temporarily totally disabled by reason of an injury or disease entitling them to compensation during the period of such total disability.

That said bureau shall also provide, without charge therefor, hospital, dental, medical, and surgical care and treatment and prosthetic appliances for all honorably discharged commissioned officers and enlisted men, disabled by reason of any wound or injury received or disease contracted while in the service of the United States and in the line of duty: Provided, That application for such care and treatment and appliances shall be made within one year from the date of the man's discharge or from the date this act goes into effect, whichever is the later.

SEC. 6. That whenever a claim under United States Government life insurance (converted insurance) is to be paid because of the total permanent disability of the insured, such payment shall be made out of the military and naval insurance appropriation. And in cases where the insured has been relieved of the payment of premiums, such premiums shall be paid by the United States into the United States Government life insurance fund out of said military and naval insurance appropriation.

To meet the costs of the provisions of this section there shall be transferred each year from the military and naval insurance appropriation into the United States Government life-insurance fund an amount equal to 8 per cent of the premiums paid during the previous fiscal year for United States Government life insurance (converted insurance). If such amount should prove to be insufficient to meet the costs of the provisions of this section an additional amount shall be transferred therefor.

SEC. 7. That section 19 of the act entitled "An act to amend and modify the war-risk insurance act," approved December 24, 1919, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 19. That the amount of the monthly installments of allotment and family allowance, compensation, or insurance which has heretofore or which may hereafter become payable under the provisions of the war-risk insurance act, but which has not been paid prior to the death of the person entitled to receive the same, shall be paid to the executor or administrator of such deceased person, but if no demand in writing has been made by such executor or administrator, then, in cases where the amount is $400 or less, the same shall be paid in the following order of precedence: First, to the widow; second, if decedent left no widow, or the widow be dead at the time of settlement, then to the children and their issue per stirpes; third, if no widow, children, or issue of children, then to the father and mother in equal parts; fourth, if either the father or mother be dead, then to the one surviving; fifth, if there be no widow, child, issue of children, father, or mother at the date of settlement, then to the brothers and sisters and the children of the deceased brothers and sisters, per stirpes: Provided, That this section shall not be so construed as to prevent payment from the amount due the decedent's estate of his funeral expenses, expenses of his last illness, board, rent, or other household expenses for which the decedent was liable, provided a claim therefor is presented by the person or persons who actually paid the same, before settlement by the Bureau of War Risk Insurance."

SEC. 8. That the Director of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, is hereby authorized to make such rules and regulations as may be deemed necessary in order to promote good conduct on the part of persons who are receiving care or treatment in hospitals as patients of said bureau during their stay in such hospitals. Penalties for the breach of such rules and regulations may extend to a forfeiture by the offender of such portion of the compensation payable to him, not exceeding three-fourths of the monthly installment per month for three months, for a breach committed while receiving treatment in such hospital, as may be prescribed by such rules and regulations.

SEC. 9. That all acts or parts of acts or amendments in conflict with this act are hereby repealed or modified to conform herewith.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SWEET] is recognized for one hour.

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Chairman, the bill, H. R. 13558, which is now before us for consideration is largely an administrative measure and is supplemental to legislation heretofore passed by Congress in connection with the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, which has for its purpose the taking care of the soldiers, sailors, and marines of this country who were disabled during the Great War and those who were dependent upon them for maintenance and support.

The report which accompanies H. R. 13558 is based largely on a bill introduced by Congressman WASON, of New Hampshire, to which many additions have been made which were suggested by the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, by Members of Congress, and by the American Legion. In fact, during the hearings the committee did not confine itself to the Wason bill, but considered all bills introduced by Members of Congress since the enactment of H. R. 8778, which was signed by the President on December 24, 1919.

All parties, whether Members of Congress or otherwise, were permitted to present facts and arguments in connection with any legislation which they believed would be beneficial and proper for the better and more efficient administration of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance.

Section 1 of the bill provides that the Bureau of War Risk Insurance is authorized to establish throughout the United States and its outlying possessions such regional offices, not exceeding 14 in number, and such suboffices as may be deemed necessary in the best interests of the work committed to said bureau.

An effort is being made to coordinate the work to be rendered the soldiers, sailors, and marines of the recent war by bringing the offices of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, the Bureau of Public Health Service, the Federal Board for Vocational Education, the Red Cross, and other kindred organizations closer together, so that there will be a community of interest and concert of action among those who are endeavoring to render services which will add to the comfort, health, benefit, and betterment of the men and women who took part in the great conflict.

The reason that the bill provides for 14 regional offices is due largely to the fact that the Bureau of Public Health Service now has 14 regional offices. An effort has been made and is now being made to have the regional offices in connection with the Bureau of Public Health Service and the Federal Board for Vocational Education and the Bureau of War Risk Insurance occupy one building in a city where these regional offices are to be established. By doing this the records in one office can be used expeditiously in the other offices.

For instance, if a young man wishes to take up vocational training under the vocational rehabilitation act, he can make application and have his case taken care of without unnecessary delay.

The medical officers in connection with the Bureau of Public Health can examine him, the Bureau of War Risk Insurance can give him his rating as to his disability, and the men in the offices in connection with the Federal Board for Vocational Education can give him the necessary information and instruction as to his training and the best course for him to pursue.

If the offices are all established in one building, all this service can be readily rendered to the soldiers, sailors, and marines who make application. A great amount of confusion and red tape will be done away with, and the general result will be more satisfactory to everyone concerned.

The names of the cities where the 14 regional offices are now established by the Federal Board for Vocational Education are as follows: Boston, New York City, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Atlanta, New Orleans, Cincinnati, Chicago, St. Louis, Minneapolis, Denver, San Francisco, Seattle, and Dallas.

In addition to that, it will not only lessen the office expenses, coordinate the work, but it should bring about a more general good feeling toward the Government and the Government agencies that are engaged in this beneficent and humanitarian work.

This section of the bill will make it possible for the Bureau of War Risk Insurance to not only do the work assigned to it more expeditiously and economically but it will bring the soldiers, sailors, and marines of this country in closer contact with the workings of these various organizations and bureaus of the Treasury Department that have been especially established for their benefit and convenience.

It will also bring to their attention and acquaint them with the rights and privileges that have been provided for them in legislation of this character, and they will thus be instructed as to the method and procedure necessary for them to follow in obtaining these benefits.

The section also provides for the establishment of suboffices to cooperate with the regional offices and the Bureau of War Risk Insurance at Washington.

By the establishment of these regional offices and the suboffices papers and applications will not be sent in to Washington in improper shape and unsatisfactory condition.

At the present time, for instance, if a soldier should write to Washington from the State of California and ask for an explanation of his rights under the war-risk insurance act, it would take some four or five days for the letter to reach the office of the bureau. Then the bureau would send out the information to the soldier, perhaps send a blank application for him to sign before a notary public, to be returned to the bureau at Washington.

When the application arrives at Washington perhaps it is found that the notary neglected to place his seal on the application, or the soldier has not filled out the application carefully, or perhaps has failed to sign the application at all. It would then be necessary for the bureau to return the papers with more definite instructions, and thus a month perhaps has expired and the soldier has not received any benefit from the war-risk insurance act, becomes exasperated, and complains about red tape and the long delay.

If a regional office or a suboffice were established in the State of California, where trained men could go over the papers of each applicant and have them properly signed and filled out, time would be saved and the work at the bureau at Washington would be lessened and all matters would be done in a more satisfactory and businesslike way.

This section also provides for an appropriation of $1,000,000 out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated for the establishment and maintenance of the regional offices and suboffices.

Section 2 provides that the Postmaster General is authorized to receive war-risk insurance premiums and act for and turn over to the Secretary of the Treasury the money so received. He is also authorized to receive and transmit to the Bureau of War Risk Insurance applications for converted insurance and applications for reinstatement of lapsed insurance.

This is to be done under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury and the Postmaster General may prescribe.

In making such collections the Postmaster General is authorized to use postal money orders, postal notes, war-risk insurance coupons, or any other method of collection which may be deemed most expedient and satisfactory.

Every soldier, sailor, and marine who desires to pay war-risk insurance premiums or desires to make an application for reinstatement of lapsed insurance or for converted insurance may go to the post office at the place of his residence and the postmaster will receive the insurance premiums and give him a receipt therefor, and his application for reinstatement or for converted insurance will be transmitted immediately to the Bureau of War Risk Insurance.

This will provide a definite and convenient place for the payment of premiums and will in a measure lessen correspondence with the Bureau of War Risk Insurance and do away with a great deal of confusion, red tape, and delay.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWEET. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Is it the purpose of the bill to do away with the war-risk department here in Washington and establish it in these 14 different places?

Mr. SWEET. Not at all. These are regional offices, or suboffices, that will work in connection with the War Risk Bureau here in Washington.

Mr. McKEOWN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWEET. Certainly.

Mr. McKEOWN. Are these applications to be taken at the various post offices throughout the United States, or the payments to be received there instead of being remitted to the department here in Washington? As I understand it, the soldier can pay his insurance at any post office in the United States.

Mr. SWEET. Under the rules and regulations provided by the Secretary of the Treasury and the Postmaster General the soldier can go to the post office at the place of his residence, pay his premium, receive his receipt, and the payment will be transmitted to the Bureau of War Risk Insurance.

Mr. McKEOWN. Will there be any provision for additional compensation to postmasters who have performed this additional service?

Mr. SWEET. I think not.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWEET. I do.

Mr. CANNON. There are many thousands of these post offices. Is there discretion to provide that payment shall be made at one post office in a county, or can they be made to any postmaster?

Mr. SWEET. To any postmaster under the provisions of the bill, but perhaps under the rules and regulations provided by the Secretary of the Treasury and the Postmaster General certain post offices will be designated.

Mr. CANNON. There are so many fourth-class post offices in little, uncomfortable places.

Mr. SWEET. That is true, but that can be taken care of in the rules and regulations to be provided by the Secretary of the Treasury and the Postmaster General.

Mr. CANNON. And there is no compensation to any of these postmasters for their service in this respect?

Mr. SWEET. I understand not.

Mr. McKEOWN. Does not the gentleman think there ought to be compensation to the postmasters?

Mr. SWEET. I think that can be taken care of later on if it becomes necessary.

Mr. McKEOWN. They are among the poorest paid people in the Government service.

Mr. SWEET. That is true; but we are not taking up the question of the compensation of postmasters in this bill.

Mr. KINKAID. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWEET. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. KINKAID. Can the gentleman tell us how many employees will be required at each one of these regional offices to be established under this bill?

Mr. SWEET. It depends, of course, on the amount of business done there. It has been estimated that from three to five employees will be required, probably somewhere along in that neighborhood.

Mr. KINKAID. What is the difference between this kind of a plan for regional offices and the plan we had for regional pension agencies under the pension bureau, which were abolished some years ago?

Mr. SWEET. They are endeavoring to coordinate the Public Health Service, the Board for Vocational Training, and the Bureau of War Risk Insurance by placing them in one building in each of these cities, so that all matters pertaining to war-risk insurance and vocational training can readily be taken up and disposed of. We have a different proposition to contend with at this time. We have vocational training and we have insurance, and we are not dealing solely with pensions or compensation and the payment thereof, and it necessitates the sending of many more technical papers in the making of the applications than were required to be made out and sent to the Pension Department.

Mr. KINKAID. I thank the gentleman. I will not take more of his time.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWEET. Certainly.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Will the gentleman state again the estimated number of employees who will be required in these regional offices?

Mr. SWEET. They said if they could coordinate the regional office with the Vocational Board and also with the Public Health Service, ordinarily there would be from three to five persons employed at each office. In some instances there may be more, depending upon the amount of work to be done.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Does not the gentleman think it would be nearer 300 or 500?

Mr. SWEET. The number will naturally increase as the work at any office increases.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. It is presumed that the number of employees in the Washington office will be correspondingly reduced, is it not?

Mr. SWEET. Yes; and it will do away with a whole lot of extra writing, and will diminish the force required here at Washington, so that it is estimated that the total expense will not be what it is to-day, because it will do away with a great deal of confusion that the Bureau of War Risk Insurance is experiencing in receiving letters and in making replies thereto. Whenever applications are sent in by these regional offices it is expected that they will be returned in good shape, properly executed, and that it will do away with a great amount of help now required at Washington.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. And get quicker results for the boys?

Mr. SWEET. It will improve the service to the boys.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWEET. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. Looking over this bill I find that it provides an appropriation of $1,000,000, but there is no provision in the bill that fixes the salaries of the regional directors or the men who will have charge. How will those salaries be fixed, in the gentleman's judgment?

Mr. SWEET. Of course, it is left to the discretion of the Director of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, through the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWEET. Certainly.

Mr. BLACK. Does not the gentleman think it is a very unusual procedure for Congress to provide an appropriation of $1,000,000 and leave it absolutely within the discretion of the Director of the War Risk Insurance Bureau to fix the salaries of these regional directors? Does the gentleman think we ought to do that?

Mr. SWEET. I do under the circumstances. I say it is unusual; but in order to facilitate this work, I think it should be done in that way.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. SWEET. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. How many of these regional offices are there to be?

Mr. SWEET. There are to be 14 regional offices.

Mr. CANNON. And then all the postmasters, and the whole thing will be fixed by regulation, and there could be an army of officials appointed under this bill?

Mr. SWEET. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. At $1,000, at $5,000, or any other amount that the Secretary of the Treasury might fix?

Mr. SWEET. That is true.

Mr. CANNON. With no limit to it?

Mr. SWEET. Of course, this $1,000,000 that is to be appropriated here is to cover the question of rent, of supplies, of salaries, and of fixtures to be used in connection with the maintenance and establishment of these offices.

Mr. CANNON. For one month, or two months, or six months, or six years?

Mr. SWEET. This is a continuing appropriation, as I view it, and will be available until expended.

Mr. CANNON. Has the gentleman made any estimate of what the annual cost would be and how many officials there will be in these various 14 offices?

Mr. SWEET. In a very general way. The estimate is that it will take about $1,000,000 to handle this properly for one year.

Mr. CANNON. Is it not for 10 years or 20 years? Is it not indefinite?

Mr. SWEET. It is until Congress might change it. It is a matter that would come up each year in connection with the appropriation committee.

Mr. CANNON. It would require an annual appropriation?

Mr. SWEET. I think it would.

Mr. CANNON. Is it anticipated that there will be traveling people spending this money to work up and inform?

Mr. SWEET. It is not the purpose of the bureau to go out and solicit insurance in any way. It is for the purpose of bringing the soldiers in contact with the bureau so that they may receive the benefits that Congress has provided for them.

Mr. CANNON. And to anticipate advertising and the issuance of documents, instructions to be sent through the mail from the central office or any of these offices.

Mr. SWEET. This is to cover the expenses for establishment and maintenance of these offices.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. RAYBURN. The very provision in the bill for advertisement was stricken out by the committee.

Mr. CANNON. There will be no kind of advertising?

Mr. RAYBURN. Not under this bill. The Bureau of War Risk Insurance under the appropriation given them by the gentleman's committee have been doing that.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman from Iowa recollects the various pension agencies that we had scattered throughout the States? There was one in Chicago, one in Springfield, and in many of the States there were three or four, with rooms leased if they were not in Government buildings, and it took many a long year and many a long decade before we could get rid of those pension agencies. It was just so much patronage, very largely, given not for the benefit of the soldier but for the benefit of the official. Is the gentleman familiar with the operation of those pension agencies?

Mr. SWEET. In a very general way.

Mr. CANNON. I think it has not been more than three or four years since we were able to get rid of these expensive offices, and they were very expensive, scattered, as they were, all over the country. The result has been, as I understand it, that the public business in connection with the Pension Office has been much more economically and satisfactorily administered to the Government and the pensioner than it was prior to that time. Were there extended hearings upon this bill?

Mr. SWEET. Yes; everyone was given an opportunity to appear and present facts and arguments, either for or against the bill.

Mr. CANNON. And the gentleman estimates that this million dollars will pay for only one year?

Mr. SWEET. About one year I should judge.

Mr. CANNON. This makes the appropriation and not the authorization.

Mr. SWEET. Yes; it makes the appropriation.

Mr. CANNON. Has the gentleman made any calculation as to what the grand expense will be as the years come and go, in so far as appropriations are concerned, after the machinery is all put in motion, cooperating with the vocational people and with the Public Health Service?

Mr. SWEET. I have not.

Mr. ESCH. That would come under the jurisdiction of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. SWEET. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, no.

Mr. ESCH. Hereafter.

Mr. CANNON. But as I understand it, it is within the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury. He can make the regulations.

Mr. SWEET. Section 3 of the bill provides that the family allowance shall be awarded and paid to any person within class A for the full period defined in section 204 of the war-risk insurance act or for such part of said period as it shall be shown that the necessary relationship existed between such person and an enlisted man in the active military or naval service, in cases where deductions from the pay of the enlisted man for compulsory allotment have not been made but the family allowance was applied for during the service of the enlisted man, notwithstanding the fact that such enlisted man has died in, or been discharged from, the service: Provided, however, That compulsory allotment has not been waived or that exemption therefrom has not been heretofore or shall not be hereafter granted.

Any awards or adjustments hereafter made which are inconsistent with the provisions of this section may, upon application, be reopened and made to conform herewith.

This section simply provides for the payment of the family allowance under certain conditions.

For instance, if for some reason a man when he entered the service neglected to make an allotment to his wife or stated that he was a single man when in fact he was a married man, the wife then presents her claim for compulsory allotment under class A of section 204 of the war-risk insurance act. The marriage certificate as well as the birth certificates of the children are submitted, and it is found that in justice she is entitled to the allotment and family allowance.

In many instances before the true facts are brought to the attention of the bureau and before an award of allotment and family allowance has been made to the wife the man is discharged from the service. He has drawn his full pay and the wife has received no part of it.

While the man was in the service the wife was deprived not only of the compulsory allotment but also of the family allowance through no fault of her own.

This section provides that the Government shall pay the family allowance for the full period defined in section 204, provided that under all the facts and circumstances the family allowance should have been awarded to her during the period of the husband's service.

This section is practically the same as the Treadway amendment to House bill 8778, amending and modifying the war-risk insurance act, and which passed the House on September 13, 1919. This amendment was stricken out of House bill 8778 by the Senate committee.

Section 4 is an amendment to subsection 2 of section 313 of the war-risk insurance act by adding thereto subsection 2a.

The Bureau of War Risk Insurance is authorized to pay the beneficiary or other person or persons in whose name an action may have been commenced or prosecuted fees and mileage, the same as is now paid the witnesses in the United States court in going to, remaining at, and returning from the place of trial, without regard to the court where the action is brought.

It is also provided in this section that in all cases of assignment of causes of action under section 313, whether the assignment be heretofore or hereafter made, where it shall appear to the director to be to the best interests of the persons so to do, the director, acting in the name of the United States, may assign the cause of action back to the beneficiary or his personal representative.

Section 313 provides that if an injury or death for which compensation is payable is caused under circumstances creating a legal liability upon some person other than the United States or the enemy to pay damages therefor, the director of the bureau, as a condition to payment of compensation by the United States, may require the beneficiary to assign to the United States any right of action he may have to enforce such liability of such other person. The cause of action so assigned to the United States may be prosecuted or compromised by the director, and any money realized or collected thereon, less the reasonable expenses of such realization or collection, shall be placed to the credit of the military or naval compensation appropriation.

Again, section 313, subsection 2, provides that if an injury or death for which compensation may be made payable under article 313 is caused under circumstances creating a legal liability upon some person other than the United States or the enemy to pay damages therefor, then in order to preserve the right of action the director of the bureau may require the conditional beneficiary at any time after the injury or death to assign such right of action to the United States, or, if it appears to be for the best interests of such conditional beneficiary, to prosecute said cause of action in his own name subject to regulations.

Under these circumstances the beneficiary or the person in whose name an action may have been commenced or prosecuted will be entitled to fees and mileage the same as is now paid and allowed to witnesses in the United States courts without regard to the court in which the action is commenced and prosecuted. It matters not whether it be a United States court or some other court.

This section in the bill also provides that if the action has been assigned to the United States by a beneficiary, the director of the bureau, acting for and in the name of the United States, may assign the cause of action back to the beneficiary or his personal representative.

Under the present law there is no provision whereby, when a cause of action referred to in section 313 of the war-risk insurance act is once assigned to the United States, that it can be assigned back to the beneficiary or his personal representative.

This is purely an administrative matter.

Section 5 provides that the Bureau of War Risk Insurance shall relieve from the payment of premiums on renewable term insurance the following persons, to wit: (a) Those who are receiving hospital care under said bureau, during the period they are receiving such care; (b) those who are receiving vocational training pursuant to the vocational rehabilitation act, during the period of such training; and (c) those who are temporarily totally disabled by reason of an injury or disease entitling them to compensation, during the period of such total disability.

It is estimated that those who are receiving vocational training pursuant to the vocational rehabilitation act under class 2 average per year for the fiscal year 1921 would be about 55,000. It is estimated that those who are receiving vocational training pursuant to the vocational rehabilitation act under class 3 average per year for the fiscal year 1921 about 5,000. It is estimated that those who are temporarily totally disabled, some of whom are receiving hospital care under the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, average per year for the fiscal year 1921 would be about 20,000.

In making the above estimates the average policy was figured at $9,000, the age of the soldiers, sailors, and marines 27 years, and that 90 per cent of the men were insured.

The provisions of this act would then apply to about 72,000 men who are receiving hospital care under the bureau or receiving vocational training pursuant to the vocational rehabilitation act, or disabled ex-service men who have been rated by the bureau as temporarily totally disabled by reason of an injury or disease entitling them to compensation during the period of such total disability.

It is estimated that the amount of premiums on renewable term insurance, the payment of which soldiers, sailors, and marines would be relieved for the fiscal year 1921, would be about $5,000,000.

I recently received a letter from a disabled ex-service man who at present is taking training in the University of Chicago under the vocational rehabilitation act. He states, in part, in regard to the bill that is now before us for consideration:

> As a disabled man who will be in training at least three years more, I am quite interested in the bill you are reporting to the House providing for the coordination of the Federal Board for Vocational Education, the United States Public Health Service, and the Bureau of War Risk Insurance.
> I am also interested in the relief granted from the payment of term insurance premiums for men who are under hospital care, men who are in training under the vocational rehabilitation act, and men who have been rated as temporarily totally disabled.
> I urge you, on behalf of myself and of the 70 disabled men at the school, to leave no stone unturned to secure favorable action on the bill.
> The proposed plan will greatly simplify the care and training of men who are concerned. Now, when a man endeavors to secure treatment while in training he is subjected to vexations and unavoidable delays, losses of time, and training.
> The problem of a disabled man to meet living costs while at school away from home and in large cities, as most of them are, is hard enough without the additional burden of keeping up the insurance we must keep up because we can get no other.
> We are rejoiced to learn of the passage by the House of H. R. 12266, providing for an increase in pay and allowance for us. All of us carry the name SWEET in our memory as the name that spelled the squarest kind of a deal for us in regard to retroactive compensation.
> Will you please send me the number of the bill discussed above.

Section 5 further provides that the Bureau of War Risk Insurance shall provide, without charge therefor, hospital, dental, medical, and surgical care and treatment and prosthetic appliances for all honorably discharged commissioned officers and enlisted men, disabled by reason of any wound or injury received or disease contracted while in the service of the United States and in the line of duty, provided that application for such care and treatment and appliances shall be made within one year from the date of the man's discharge or from the date this act goes into effect, whichever is the later.

Section 6 provides that whenever a claim under United States Government life insurance—converted insurance—is to be paid because of the total permanent disability of the insured, such payment shall be made out of the military and naval insurance appropriation; and in cases where the insured has been relieved of the payment of premiums, such premiums shall be paid by the United States into the United States Government life insurance fund out of said military and naval insurance appropriation.

In other words, the United States Government will pay all claims for total permanent disability of the insured in connection with the United States Government life insurance—converted insurance—without reference to any premiums paid by the insured.

The total-disability claims in connection with converted insurance policies will be paid out of the military and naval insurance appropriation, and in all cases where the insured has been relieved from the payment of premiums the United States Government pays the premiums into the United States Government life insurance fund without regard to the terms of the policy.

Section 6 also provides that to meet the cost of the provisions of this section there will be transferred each year from the military and naval insurance appropriation into the United States Government life insurance fund an amount equal to 8 per cent of the premiums paid during the previous fiscal year for United States Government life insurance—converted insurance.

It is also provided that if such amount should prove to be insufficient to meet the costs of the provisions of this section an additional amount shall be transferred therefor.

The provisions of section 6 are for the purpose of stabilizing and making more attractive Government life insurance—converted insurance—and placing the whole plan of Government life insurance upon a sound basis.

Section 7 is an amendment to section 19 of "An act to amend and modify the war risk insurance act," approved December 24, 1919.

Section 7 provides that the amount of monthly installments of allotment and family allowance, compensation, or insurance which has heretofore or which may hereafter become payable under the provisions of the war risk insurance act, but which has not been paid prior to the death of the person entitled to receive the same, shall be paid to the executor or administrator of such deceased person, but if no demand in writing has been made by such executor or administrator, then, in cases where the amount is $400 or less, the same shall be paid in the following order of precedence: First, to the widow; second, if decedent left no widow, or the widow be dead at the time of settlement, then to the children and their issue, per stirpes; third, if no widow, children, or issue of children, then to the father and mother in equal parts; fourth, if either the father or mother be dead, then to the one surviving; and, fifth, if there be no widow, child, issue of children, father, or mother at the date of settlement, then to the brothers and sisters and the children of the deceased brothers and sisters, per stirpes.

Section 7 also provides that section 19 shall not be so construed as to prevent payment from the amount due the decedent's estate of his funeral expenses, expenses of his last illness, board, rent, or other household expenses for which decedent was liable, provided a claim therefor is presented by the person or persons who actually paid the same, before settlement by the Bureau of War Risk Insurance.

This section is purely administrative and analogous to the provisions of an act passed by Congress on June 30, 1906—chapter 3914, section 1, volume 34, Federal Statutes at Large, page 750—relative to the payment of balance due on settlement of accounts of deceased officer or enlisted man to widow or heirs, and so forth, and, according to reports, has worked admirably.

It is what might be termed a clean-up provision, so that the amounts of monthly installments of allotment and family allowance, compensation, or insurance which have not been paid prior to the death of the person entitled to receive the same shall be paid to an executor or administrator of such deceased person; but if no demand in writing has been made by such executor or administrator, then, in cases where the amount is $400 or less, the same shall be paid to the members of the family directly, as provided in this section, without regard to the statutes of any particular State.

Section 8 provides that the Director of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, is hereby authorized to make such rules and regulations as may be deemed necessary in order to promote good conduct on the part of persons who are receiving care or treatment in hospitals as patients of said bureau during their stay in such hospitals. Penalties for the breach of such rules and regulations may extend to a forfeiture by the offender of such portion of the compensation payable to him, not exceeding three-fourths of the monthly installment per month for three months, for a breach committed while receiving treatment in such hospital, as may be prescribed by such rules and regulations.

This provision is placed in the law for the purpose of maintraining discipline among the patients who are receiving care or treatment in the hospitals as patients of the War Risk Insurance Bureau.

Section 9 provides that all acts or parts of acts or amendments in conflict with this act are hereby repealed or modified to conform herewith.

The Secretary of the Treasury, in his report to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, on April 24, 1920, stated in part as follows:

MY DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: It is my sincere hope that the so-called Wason bill, H. R. 13558, as reported out of your committee, will be acted upon favorably with the utmost speed by the House of Representatives, and that it may become a law at the earliest possible moment.

The bill as reported has been carefully reviewed and it has the unqualified indorsement of the Director of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance and myself.

The provisions of the Wason bill, which your committee has just reported, are in harmony with the attitude which Congress has already assumed to the ex-service men and women, and it is the earnest hope of the Treasury Department that all of these provisions will meet with the approval of the Congress and will soon become law.

The Director of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance on April 26, 1920, stated, in part, as follows:

Through the adoption of improved methods and equipment a plan to achieve an annual saving of approximately $8,500,000 in the administration of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance has been inaugurated and by June 30 of the present year will have become an established régime. The bureau not only has now reached a current basis in its work, but the improved methods which have been installed have made possible at the same time a reduction of the personnel from 15,000 as of last July to approximately 9,000 as of date, with a schedule of further reduction ahead, which carried into effect will reduce the personnel to approximately 7,500 by June 30, thus virtually cutting in half the bureau's basic pay roll in the course of the fiscal year.

The Wason bill, which contained section 1 of the Wason bill we are now considering, was unanimously indorsed and approved by a resolution passed by the American Legion at its national convention in Minneapolis, Minn., on November 11, 12, and 13, 1919.

The language of the resolution relating to the Wason bill is, in part, as follows:

All of the debate and all the recommendations advanced by the legion were put forward in such a manner that it was clear that its primary motive was that of friendly helpfulness toward the Bureau of War Risk Insurance. In order that the attitude of the legion may be clear from the beginning, its conclusions are set forth as follows:

1. The duty of Congress:

(a) Pass the Sweet bill (a measure to extend the scope and functions of the war-risk act).

(b) Pass the Wason bill (a measure to extend the scope and effectiveness of the bureau's machinery so as to obtain intimate contact with the men).

On December 15, 16, and 17, 1919, the representatives, delegates, and officers met in a three days' conference at the Bureau of War Risk Insurance. At that time these representatives discussed at some length the provisions of the Wason bill and unanimously approved it.

Mr. H. H. Raege, a member of the national legislative committee of the American Legion, appeared before our committee in behalf of the members of the American Legion and other ex-service men on March 3, 1920, and expressed his approval of section 1 of the original Wason bill, which is practically the same as section 1 of the bill we are now considering. I might state further that Mr. Raege, as a member of the legislative committee of the American Legion, also approves the bill that we are now discussing and considering.

In my judgment the Bureau of War Risk Insurance is doing a splendid work and is the greatest institution for the direct benefit of the fighting men of the Nation that any country in all time has ever established and should receive the support of all Members of Congress and persons interested in giving the disabled ex-service men of this country the care, treatment, and benefits to which they are so justly entitled by reason of the sacrifices they made, the hardships they endured, and the dangers they encountered while they were in the service of their country.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWEET. Yes.

Mr. McKEOWN. I have had some complaints to the effect that the allotment of $15 was made by the soldier while in the service, we will say to his mother, and that the Government allotted $10 more; that for several months the amount was deducted from the soldier's pay but was never paid over to the mother prior to her death. Does the gentleman think it is right to take the $15 which was never delivered to the mother during the lifetime of the soldier and distribute that money among the next of kin of the deceased mother? Ought not that money to be returned to the soldier out of whose pay it was taken?

Mr. SWEET. The policy running through the War Risk Insurance Bureau has been, as near as may be, to follow the wishes of the deceased soldier.

Mr. McKEOWN. But I am not talking about the deceased soldier. I am talking about the living soldier who made an allotment to his mother, where the money was never paid over to her during her lifetime. She dies, and the department distributes that money, as I understand this bill, to the next of kin of the mother. Ought not that part of the money to be returned to the soldier, out of whose pay it was taken?

Mr. WASON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKEOWN. Yes.

Mr. WASON. I would like to ask the gentleman who has the floor if, under the question put to him by the gentleman from Oklahoma, the soldier would not have the right to file a claim with the Bureau of War Risk Insurance and receive the money that the Government had taken out of his pay?

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. He has that right now.

Mr. WASON. Is not that the practice?

Mr. SWEET. Yes.

Mr. McKEOWN. But the bureau refuses to pay the money over on the theory that the money had been set aside to the mother and must go to the next of kin of the mother, although it was not delivered in the lifetime of the mother. It looks to me like an injustice.

Mr. WASON. I agree with the spirit of the inquiry, but my experience has been that the money could be obtained by the soldier.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mine has been the opposite, because they said it had been allotted, and therefore it would go to the relatives of the mother.

Mr. SWEET. This section is put in here as a sort of clean-up section. For instance, if a soldier dies and there is money due him either as compensation or insurance, or whatever it might be, from the bureau, and if an administrator or executor is appointed, in that event the administrator or executor acts. But in case there is no executor or administrator appointed and the amount is $400 or less, this provides a certain method by which the department can pay the money to certain persons who are entitled to it without regard to the requirements of any State law, with as little expense as possible, and in many instances without the costs of administration.

Mr. McKEOWN. I agree with the gentleman as to the wisdom of the legislation, so far as the settlement of small amounts are concerned, and $400 is not an unreasonable amount that should be settled, but the thing I was asking was the injustice it appeared to me to take away from the soldier $15 of his money, and then when it was not delivered in the lifetime of his beneficiary to give it to his brothers or sisters or other relatives.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman yield——

Mr. SWEET. I do.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. For just a moment. It appears to me the matter of which the gentleman from Oklahoma is complaining will not only continue to exist, but will be justified by law if this section 19 is amended as provided by this bill. Am I correct in that construction?

Mr. SWEET. We provide a definite method here by which all these small matters can be cleaned up, and we designate the persons to whom the money shall be paid.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. And you practically take from the soldiers the right to make any claim for an allotment or allowance which has not been paid to the beneficiary designated by him during the life of such beneficiary.

Mr. SWEET. Yes; but the question of allotment and allowance in the department is dying down. There is hardly anything being done there. When a man goes out of the service the question of allowance and allotment has passed.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I know; but there are a good many of such questions undetermined and unsettled in the department.

Mr. SWEET. There are a few.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. And since this amendment to section 19 says:

> That the amount of the monthly installments of allotment and family allowance, compensation, or insurance which has heretofore or which may hereafter become payable.

Of course, it will apply as well to the unsettled accounts arising during the war as those which may have arisen since the war.

Mr. SWEET. What does the gentleman suggest as a remedy then? Here is a clear method by which this whole matter can be wound up, and it must be remembered that we are dealing with small sums of $10 or $15 largely. If the gentleman will look the whole question over, I am satisfied he will agree with the committee that had it in charge that this section gives an equitable and plain method by which the matter can be handled and with the least complication.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWEET. I do.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. I agree with the gentleman with reference to the language incorporated in the bill as being most equitable, and unless it is done it is going to necessitate the appointment of administrators and executors in the different States which would naturally eat up part of the estate. There are a great many small sums being paid to soldiers' estates, and the appointment of administrators would take a large part of such sums paid.

Mr. SWEET. That is true.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. And the laws of descent and distribution in each State will control in these matters?

Mr. SWEET. At the present time the Bureau of War Risk Insurance is troubled with the proposition of distributing small sums of this kind because of certain State laws——

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. The laws of descent and distribution in each State.

Mr. SWEET. Of the various States.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Surely.

Mr. SWEET. And this provides, so far as the Bureau of War Risk Insurance is concerned, a way in which the Federal Government can legally make the distribution of these small sums?

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. CLASSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWEET. I will.

Mr. CLASSON. I agree with the attempted procedure of paying this money; but I notice it is stated in lines 2 and 3, page 6, that if no demand in writing is made by such executor or administrator that there is no attempt to fix any time when such demand can be made or when it becomes payable in case the demand is made.

Mr. SWEET. In answer to the gentleman, I will say that originally we had in there 60 days. After discussing it, we came to the conclusion that it would hold up and prevent the Government from paying any of these small claims of ten, fifteen, or twenty dollars for funeral expenses or otherwise, because in order to be safe the Government officials would be required to wait the 60, 90, or 100 days, or whatever the time might be, before the money could be distributed.

We were dealing with small sums, and we concluded after due deliberation to leave out the question of the limit of time. If the executor or administrator is appointed before settlement is made by the bureau, it is paid to him. If the Government goes ahead and pays it to some one else in accordance with the provisions of this section, then in that event where even though there is the appointment of administrator afterwards, the Government so far as it has proceeded will not be interfered with.

Mr. CLASSON. Well, this is what I was getting at. Suppose after payment is made to some of the next of kin that the executor serves notice. What happens?

Mr. SWEET. Well, of course, as far as the Government has gone it is approved. If the Government has not taken any steps, the money is paid to the executor or administrator.

Mr. CLASSON. But if it has already been paid to some one else——

Mr. SWEET. That ends it.

Mr. CLASSON. The Government is protected?

Mr. SWEET. The Government is protected.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman yield once more?

Mr. SWEET. I will yield.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Let me ask the gentleman if the matter to which I referred a moment ago could be remedied by an amendment to this act in about the following words:

> Provided, That any unpaid installments of allotment may be returned on demand to the soldier, sailor, or marine who made such allotment.

It seems to me the question we have been discussing can arise only in the case of allotment.

Mr. SWEET. I will say to the gentleman, while I think his intention is good, that when you take into consideration the law in regard to allotment and allowance and the method by which it is to be distributed, we ought to be very careful as to the manner in which we amend the law. I am not prepared at this time without carefully going over the proposed amendment to say whether or not it would be in conflict with some other provisions of the law.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Did the committee consider the provision of the kind of allotment to the soldier who made the allotment?

Mr. SWEET. I can not say that we definitely considered that proposition, but we did go over the matter of what was a proper distribution. And I will say in this connection that in doing this we have followed largely a statute that has been in force in the War Department since June 30, 1906, chapter 3914, volume 34, Federal Statutes at Large, page 750, relative to the payment of balance due on settlement of accounts of deceased officers and enlisted men to widows or heirs and, according to reports, it has worked admirably.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman permit one more remark?

Mr. SWEET. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I think it is all right to provide that the amount due the deceased shall go to the estate of such deceased where the money comes from the Government, but where the money is an allotment made by a soldier and the allotment is not paid by the Government by order of the soldier and the soldier still lives, it seems to me some provision should be made by which he himself should get the money which he had allotted to be paid to somebody else.

Mr. SIEGEL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWEET. I will.

Mr. SIEGEL. On page 6, I notice that lines 15 to 21 practically makes the Government the collection agency for every landlord, and every doctor, and every other claim that might be made against the dead soldier, even household expenses, and so forth. Does the gentleman really think he can obtain quick administration by giving the War Risk Bureau authority to settle all these claims?

Mr. SWEET. Only to the extent of doctors' bills and preferred claims, and claims of that character. And I will say that this statute has been in force since 1906 in the War Department, and that it has worked admirably.

Mr. SIEGEL. I will say that, of course, they have dealt with only a small number of cases. Let us take as an example here that doctors' bills and rent and funeral expenses might be brought up as a subject for settlement at the War Risk Bureau, and holding up the payment that should be made to the widow or any other members of the family, and to that extent it seems to me this would be a hindrance instead of an aid. I can readily see where an undertaker could come along and put in a bill of $200 and hold the whole proposition up.

Mr. SWEET. The truth of it is that it is left wholly with the Government in making the distribution, and the manner of distribution is designated clearly. And when the Government follows the statute as here provided it is relieved of all responsibility.

Mr. SIEGEL. True; but you do not say here that nothing shall be construed to prevent the payment. In other words, you are really giving the landlord and undertaker and others a preferential and easy way of holding up the payment to be made to the widows and orphans.

Mr. SWEET. Is not that true in all estates? Is not that true in the administration of every estate?

Mr. SIEGEL. It is not true in regard to insurance left to a beneficiary; and that is all we are trying to do here, to leave it to the beneficiaries, naming the widows and orphans.

Mr. SWEET. And we designate who shall receive it.

Mr. SIEGEL. You go further and include household expenses and claims for rent that might have arisen at any time, and board, and so forth. I think it is going very far to grant the power to the War Risk Insurance Bureau to hold up such payments. The ordinary policies of insurance would be paid to the beneficiary, which would be the widow or children in this case.

Mr. BARBOUR. In the case of a deceased person, a probate court passes on it.

Mr. SIEGEL. This gives the War Risk Insurance Bureau authority to pass upon it, and it is supposed to be insurance left for the benefit of the widow or children, the same as in a regular insurance policy. There is no reason why it should be held up.

Mr. SWEET. The Government here has provided a method by which it is to be distributed, and the method provided here, as set forth in the section, we believe is the most equitable way of handling the situation and disposing of the matter.

Mr. SIEGEL. What we are doing, then, is that we are practically making the War Risk Insurance Bureau the judge to determine the amount which will be paid for the funeral expenses, and so forth.

Mr. SWEET. That is left discretionary with the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, and this bill provides the method by which it shall be done.

Mr. SIEGEL. I am frank to say that I will make a motion to strike it out, because I do not think it is doing justice to the widows or the orphans.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. SWEET. I will.

Mr. TILSON. As to the establishment of these 14 regional offices, is it the intention to go out in the country and establish 14 new agencies of the Government, with a full complement of employees, and so on? Is that the intention?

Mr. SWEET. I think it is. The thought is to establish them in conjunction with the Public Health Service and the Vocational Board.

Mr. TILSON. Already we have a very large department here in Washington organized, or in a state of being organized. We have been for some two years past trying to get an organization completed. In addition to that, are we to have 14 different organizations all over the country to attend to this work?

Mr. SWEET. Fourteen organizations, or fourteen regions, and they cooperate with the office at Washington.

Mr. TILSON. It will be so much added on to what we already have?

Mr. SWEET. It has been stated that by the establishment of these offices the papers will be received at Washington in better shape and the work will be done with less help, and instead of increasing it will lessen the expenses of the administration of the office.

Mr. TILSON. The contention is that 14 suboffices and 1 main office can be operated more economically than 1 main office?

Mr. SWEET. From a business standpoint, that is true.

Mr. TILSON. It does not look well on the face of it, I will admit.

Mr. SWEET. But when you realize the confusion and congestion that have existed here in the War Risk Insurance Bureau in the handling of all these matters and the unusual amount of correspondence and confusion that have arisen in sending in premiums—and they do not know whether a premium has been paid or not, and they get no receipt back—if these regional offices are established throughout the country the soldiers and sailors and marines will be given an opportunity to come in close contact with them, so that they can do business in a businesslike way and not simply by corresponding with persons, in some instances 3,000 miles away.

Mr. TILSON. Is it the gentleman's idea that this work is too big to be organized in one office, and therefore to conduct it economically it should be split up into 15 organizations? Is that the contention?

Mr. SWEET. In a sense that is true; but where you take into consideration that the persons who are interested in the bureau, living all over the country everywhere, can come in closer touch with it, it is not a question of placing it in one office, but a question of getting in close contact with those who are in the War Risk Bureau, and in order to do that in an intelligent way these regional offices are to be established throughout the country.

Mr. TILSON. But this is a very big country, and 15 offices will not bring everybody in close contact with an office.

Mr. SWEET. Very true; but the bill also provides for suboffices.

Mr. TILSON. Oh, there is to be an addition to these 14?

Mr. SWEET. Yes. There will be some offices in connection with them.

Mr. BLANTON. Each big office will have a dozen little ones.

Mr. TILSON. I am thinking of the overhead expense. It seems to me that too much of this is to be used for overhead, rather than for the carrying out of the purpose for which the bureau was established. Unless that is satisfactorily explained it would seem to me to be a dangerous venture.

Mr. SWEET. The whole thought here is to make, if possible, the service rendered by the War Risk Bureau more efficient, and this is the method proposed by which that is to be accomplished.

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWEET. Yes.

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. Has the committee taken into consideration the question of how long it may be necessary to keep these subdivisions in operation?

Mr. BLANTON. Forty years.

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. I am very much in favor of bringing this service nearer to the soldiers for the time being if that is practicable, but does not the gentleman think that within a period of three or four years we might abolish the substations?

Mr. SWEET. The tendency should be that way; after the soldiers and sailors and marines have really found out what their benefits are and have received them these offices should be discontinued.

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. That is the greatest advantage which can come to the soldier—getting such information as will enable him to start on this work?

Mr. SWEET. Yes.

Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SWEET] yielded me three minutes.

Mr. Chairman, if there is anything on which I have definitely made up my mind, it is upon the proposition that I am not going to vote for the establishment of one single additional bureau in this Government. We have too many now. We ought to be getting rid of some instead of having more.

Right in the first section of the bill special provision is made for the establishment of 14 new bureaus and the expenditure of $1,000,000 to launch them, and the distinguished gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SWEET], who has just taken his seat, has admitted that each one of these 14, each big one, is going to have a lot of little ones. There is going to be some more divided up over the country; there are going to be additional ones under each one of these 14 mother bureaus.

Mr. Chairman, I am against it. The distinguished gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TIMBERLAKE] asked a very pertinent question when he inquired when we are going to get rid of them. I challenge you to go to the distinguished Members of this House who have been in the service for many years and have them tell you how long it took them to get rid of the pension agencies throughout the country. Will the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] tell?

Mr. CANNON. I think four or five years ago we got rid of them.

Mr. BLANTON. About three years ago, was it not?

Mr. CANNON. Well, I think about four years ago.

Mr. ESCH. I think they were abolished about seven years ago. But they were not established right after the Civil War.

Mr. BLANTON. I will tell you how long it will take us to get rid of these agencies if they are established throughout the country. It will take 40 years, and then you may not get rid of all of them.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman asked me a question. I recollect that it was not later than 1870 that these pension agencies were established.

Mr. BLANTON. And you got rid of them only about seven years ago. Then I was not far off in my guess when I said 40 years would be required to get rid of these proposed new ones. That is the limit. Are you going to vote to establish 14 more new bureaus? I am not.

Mr. Chairman, this is such an important bill——

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. In just a minute. This is such an important bill and we have so few of my distinguished colleagues in the Republican Party here in their seats who have charge of the legislation of this House that I think the balance of them ought to come here and find out what we are doing this Calendar Wednesday afternoon. Therefore I make the point of no quorum in order that they may be brought here and find out that we are proposing to create 14 new bureaus.

Mr. SWEET. Will not the gentleman withdraw his point of order? I did not yield to him to make a point of order. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLANTON. I yield back to the gentleman the time that I may have remaining, and then in my own right I make the point of no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of no quorum. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Evidently there is no quorum present.

Mr. BLANTON. I hope that we can get a quorum here for the balance of the afternoon, and that is what we will have to do.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is out of order. The Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LEHLBACH, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 13558) for the purpose of improving the facilities and service of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, and of further amending and modifying the war-risk insurance act as amended, found itself without a quorum; whereupon he caused the roll to be called, when 277 Members, a quorum, answered to their names, and he handed in the list of the absentees for printing in the Journal and RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The committee will resume its session.

Accordingly the committee resumed its session, with Mr. LEHLBACH in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SWEET] has five minutes remaining.

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Chairman, it was not my purpose to consume the whole of the hour. I understand there are five minutes remaining. In view of the fact that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] and others have not a sufficient amount of time, I ask unanimous consent that the time for general debate be extended 30 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. There is still an hour remaining in opposition to the bill.

Mr. SWEET. As I understand it, Mr. Chairman, there is no opposition to the bill, and therefore we are entitled to one hour.

The CHAIRMAN. Then no request is necessary. If no one claims the floor, the Chair will instruct the Clerk to read the bill for amendment.

Mr. SWEET. But, as a matter of courtesy, I have asked unanimous consent that the time for general debate be extended 30 minutes, so as to give others an opportunity to be heard.

Mr. CANNON. That would make it an hour and thirty minutes altogether.

Mr. SWEET. That would make it 30 minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that that is not in order in the committee.

Mr. CANNON. There is an hour left.

Mr. SWEET. As I understand it, there is not an hour left.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that under the rule those in opposition to the bill, if there be any, are entitled to one hour. The suggestion of the gentleman is in effect a limitation of that time in the committee, which is out of order.

Mr. GARD. Is not the request of the gentleman that in addition to the 1 hour allotted to anyone who may rise in opposition there be 30 minutes additional?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not so understand the request.

Mr. SWEET. Does the gentleman mean 30 minutes additional to myself?

Mr. GARD. Yes; is not that the gentleman's request?

Mr. SWEET. No; it is to give the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] and others an opportunity to talk on this question.

Mr. GARD. I understand that.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I ask recognition in my own right.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] is recognized for one hour.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas yield for a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. RAYBURN. I do, but I am not going to yield to anything that will take me off the floor.

Mr. TILSON. Does this mean that there is no one opposed to this bill and that no one will have any opportunity to speak, except in such time as may be obtained from the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN]?

Mr. RAYBURN. I think it will probably take me 10 minutes, and then I will be glad to yield to the gentleman from Connecticut, or anybody else.

The CHAIRMAN. In answer to the parliamentary inquiry the Chair will state that the rule provides that on Calendar Wednesday there shall be two hours' general debate, one hour at the disposal of the proponents of the bill and one hour in opposition. No member of the committee having sought recognition in opposition to the bill, the Chair has recognized the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. TILSON. But the Chair ought first to put the question, Is there anyone opposed to the bill?

Mr. RAYBURN. I protest, Mr. Chairman, that I can not be taken off my feet.

Mr. TILSON. Then I make the point of order that the gentleman is not entitled to the floor as long as there is anyone who is bona fide opposed to the bill who asks for time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule on the point of order. The Chair does not have to inquire as to any Member desiring to exercise his rights. No one claiming to be in opposition to the bill, and a member of the committee asking for recognition, the Chair recognized the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN]. The point of order is overruled.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I did not intend to take any time on this bill. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SWEET] made such a thorough explanation of it that it was my opinion that no further explanation in favor of the bill was necessary. It is not an intricate bill at all and is very easily understood. We want to establish 14 regional offices in addition to the central office in Washington. Experience has shown to those in charge of the bill that it has been impossible for the bureau to keep in touch with the men with whom it should be in touch at all times. The committee listened for days to these cripples and maimed men, each one coming to the committee and advocating the passage of this bill, and it heard the complaints that they have to make about the delays that they encounter on account of the distances many times, on account of having no one near them whom they could get to fill out their papers. A man in Texas or a man in California is sent a blank that he does not know how to fill out. There is no office in which a man can be found who has been instructed in this work. The man fills out his paper, sends it into the bureau; perhaps he has not signed it, perhaps he has not made an affidavit, perhaps he has left out his organization, and many other things. The document comes to the bureau. All they can do is to return it to him. Ten days or three weeks have elapsed and it gets back to him. It angers him, and many times he throws it aside and says he will have nothing more to do with it. He goes out in a bad frame of mind toward the Government.

Afterwards if he does send it back, filled out in the proper form, it has been delayed a month or six weeks. It leaves a man in a bad frame of mind. We have fixed it in the bill so that they may pay their war-risk premium through the post offices of the country and not be troubled by writing letters and having to go through the technical part of the business.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. I have not had an opportunity to read the hearings on this bill; was the Postmaster General or his designated representative given an opportunity to be heard about the requirements of section 2 of the bill?

Mr. RAYBURN. No; they were not heard. I do not know whether they asked to be heard or not. If I remember correctly, no member of the Post Office Department was heard.

Mr. BLACK. Does not the gentleman think that in an important matter of this kind it would have been the proper thing to have some representative of the Post Office Department before the committee?

Mr. RAYBURN. That is probably true; it would have been proper to have done it. But it matters not whether the Post Office Department had been willing to take on this needed work or not; I think it is of such benefit to the soldier that whether the post offices want it or not, it ought to be done.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. STEVENSON. What would the difference be between the regional offices and the suboffices? I notice that you provide for both. Is it the intention to put a suboffice in each State?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes. I think that is what would be done. There will be 14 regional offices, but they will not all be close to the soldiers. In each State where there is no office there will probably be a suboffice.

Mr. STEVENSON. What is the difference between a regional office and a suboffice? Why not make them all suboffices?

Mr. RAYBURN. The suboffices are bureaus of information, with men in them to whom the soldier can go and get information and then transmit it to the regional office.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. What is the compensation for these suboffices?

Mr. RAYBURN. I do not know what they will be fixed at.

Mr. CANNON. It is within the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, and it may be $100 or $10,000. I know in the past there was a great abuse from the Pension Office for a generation. Places are very dear to the American heart, especially if there is pay to be fixed, and every postmaster is to receive payment of premiums under the regulations so far as they may be made, and you will have to organize the fourth-class postmasters—

Mr. RAYBURN. I do not know any fourth-class postmasters in the country who have not sense enough to make out a money order. And I want to say to the gentleman that we have been running the Government for 140 years with human beings, and we have got to run it with human beings the rest of the time.

Mr. CANNON. Precisely; I am just as anxious that this work should be done well and speedily as is the gentleman; but we have had a War Risk Bureau right here in Washington under the dome of the Capitol. I think this is the third one, and I am inclined to think, without speaking disrespectfully of the other ones, that it is the best, but we are now getting rid—I was going to say a thousand clerks, but I am sure there are thousands now in the War Risk Bureau, because we withheld appropriations and because it is said they were in each other's way. It would take many years to instruct them here so that they would know their proper business.

Mr. RAYBURN. The force in the War Risk Bureau has been reduced nearly 7,000—from 16,000 to almost 9,000—and it was not reduced because appropriations were withheld, but because the department made estimates that they could carry on the business with that many. I venture to say that if the department had come before the gentleman's Committee on Appropriations and asked for 12,000 clerks they would have got them.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman knows how difficult it is to get rid of any office after it is once established.

Mr. RAYBURN. The question was raised by the gentleman from Texas, When will these regional offices be abolished?

I think when it becomes necessary that Congress ought to have nerve enough to abolish them, but as long as they can be of service to these men who gave their legs, their arms, and their eyes to the service of my country, I am willing for them to stay in operation. [Applause.]

Mr. CANNON. I quite agree with the gentleman. The gentleman can not be more patriotic or sympathetic with the disabled soldier than I, but I want the disabled soldiers to get the money we appropriate, and not an army of clerks. For long years we could not get rid of the pension agents, because it was profitable to make places for clerks. We did cut them down. In my own State there was a pension agency at Chicago and one at Springfield, and for over 40 years most of the States had two of them and some of them three. It is very easy to make an office, but it is almost impossible to abolish one.

Mr. RAYBURN. Did the gentleman know that already they have eight of these offices?

Mr. CANNON. What offices?

Mr. RAYBURN. Regional offices.

Mr. CANNON. And are any more needed if there are eight of them?

Mr. RAYBURN. There are just eight.

Mr. CANNON. Under what authority do they have them?

Mr. RAYBURN. They have established them under the general authority they have to carry on this work during the war, they say.

Mr. CANNON. If they have that authority, why give them any more?

Mr. RAYBURN. We want to make the authority definite, and to give them 14.

Mr. CANNON. I am apprehensive about efficiency, and in the name of protecting the soldier I fear that we will have an army of people who never were soldiers.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. I asked Col. Cholmeley-Jones myself whether the establishment of these 14 regional offices and the necessary subagencies would increase the total cost of the administration of the bureau. He said it absolutely would not, but that the expense would be actually reduced, together with adding the great convenience that would come of having these offices nearer the soldiers. This whole bill is administrative and nothing else.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?
Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.
Mr. McKEOWN. What objection would there be to placing in the bill a provision saying that no salary should be made in excess of a certain sum or saying that there should be 14 directors whose salaries should not exceed a certain sum of money?
Mr. RAYBURN. If the gentleman and the House wants to do that and take the responsibility, I am perfectly willing.
Mr. McKEOWN. Does not the gentleman think that would be the better way.
Mr. RAYBURN. I do not know. If we say that they shall not be paid in excess of $5,000, that is an invitation to pay that much, and if they paid every one of them $5,000, nobody here could criticize it. I do not know, but they may be able to get men for $3,000.
Mr. McKEOWN. What provision is made for appointment of other persons except these directors? Are they to be appointed under the civil service?
Mr. RAYBURN. I do not think they will be.
Mr. McKEOWN. Will the appointment of the special agents be under the civil service?
Mr. RAYBURN. I do not know. I presume they will be the same as other appointments in the Bureau of War Risk Insurance.
Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?
Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.
Mr. JONES of Texas. Are these regional officers to be given discretion in granting compensation?
Mr. RAYBURN. Not at all. The cases will all be finally passed upon by the evidence taken by the medical examiners. The medical examination will be finally passed upon by the board in the Bureau of War Risk Insurance.
Mr. JONES of Texas. So that it will be merely formal matters that they will consider.
Mr. RAYBURN. Yes; except in matters of administration they will be able to stop all of these questions at the suboffices and the regional offices.
Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?
Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.
Mr. MILLER. About how many of these suboffices will be established?
Mr. RAYBURN. I think there will probably be one in each State; may be less.
Mr. MILLER. And will there be suboffices in the same State where the regional offices are established?
Mr. RAYBURN. I should think that that would not be necessary.
Mr. MILLER. Can the gentleman further state whether this bill will enlarge the number of employees in the Bureau of War Risk Insurance?
Mr. RAYBURN. I can not state. The Director of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance believes that this bill will not add to the expense of the department and that he will be able to discharge enough employees in the bureau at the present time to offset the employees they will take on. I do not think he will be able to do it, but he thinks he will.
Mr. MILLER. They have eight suboffices now?
Mr. RAYBURN. They have eight now, but they are doubtful whether they are authorized to conduct them.
Mr. MILLER. And these new offices to be established are to be of the same character as the present suboffices?
Mr. RAYBURN. In a way, yes.
Mr. MILLER. And the regional offices are headquarters?
Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.
Mr. HUDSPETH. Will my colleague yield for a question?
Mr. RAYBURN. I will.
Mr. HUDSPETH. I infer from the statement of the gentleman from Illinois that he understands that the work done by the postmasters would be at an additional expense. Now, as I read the bill there would be no additional expense to the postmasters for this work. They do it at the salary they get at the present time.
Mr. RAYBURN. No; unless they sell more money orders and make their receipts come up in that way.
Mr. HOWARD. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. RAYBURN. I will.
Mr. HOWARD. What is the necessity of regional offices if they are going to have suboffices in the States?
Mr. RAYBURN. Well, I just answered the gentleman from South Carolina that the regional office is the clearing house and has in it men who have information which goes to the suboffices and through them to the soldier.
Mr. HOWARD. Well, does the gentleman think that the regional offices now, as operated under the Public Health Service, are efficient?
Mr. RAYBURN. I do not know. There is one in Dallas, Tex. I do not know whether it is or not. There seems to me doubt about it.
Mr. HOWARD. If the gentleman will pardon me, I raised that question for the reason my State has a regional office, located at Houston, Tex.
Mr. RAYBURN. It has been removed to Dallas.
Mr. HOWARD. If it were not for the regional office they could take up the matters directly with Washington and get good service, and this morning I received a telegram from my district stating that the delays that have taken place by reason of this regional office are a disgrace to our treatment of the soldiers.
Mr. RAYBURN. Well, there is nothing in the establishment of a regional office at Dallas, Tex., to prevent a man from communicating directly with the Bureau of War Risk Insurance at Washington.
Mr. HOWARD. I know. But the point I make is that with the regional office the matter is referred somewhere farther away. Why not cut out the regional office and let each State deal directly with the War Risk Bureau in Washington——
Mr. RAYBURN. That has been the argument on that subject, but I do not agree with that. I think we ought to have these regional offices and to have enough men employed in them to give the information, and that would stop two-thirds of the business, in my opinion, that is coming to Washington, because two-thirds of the letters written by these men are written for information only.
Mr. HOWARD. I am asking the gentleman for information, because I am candidly of the opinion myself that it seems that the regional offices will only complicate matters.
Mr. RAYBURN. In the makeshift way they are at present, in all probability that is true.
Mr. MacCRATE and Mr. SUMMERS of Washington rose.
Mr. RAYBURN. I yield to the gentleman from New York.
Mr. MacCRATE. Has the gentleman any figures showing the average cost of the upkeep of the present eight offices?
Mr. RAYBURN. I have not.
Mr. MacCRATE. There are no figures showing what each of the eight offices cost?
Mr. RAYBURN. Not unless they were put in the hearings, and I do not remember.
Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. RAYBURN. I will.
Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Is there any limitation as to the office the soldier shall communicate with as to whether it shall be the suboffice or the regional office or the office here in Washington?
Mr. RAYBURN. Not at all. The soldier can communicate with any agency that he cares to, but when he writes direct to Washington and has a suboffice in his State to give the information, in all probability it is referred back there to take it up with the soldier and they can send a man to see him or he can come to see them where it is only a matter of 100 or 200 miles.
Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Suppose he has written several letters here and then takes up the matter with the regional office. Must they not have that correspondence from the central office here and finally, as they have final jurisdiction, must not that be returned to the central office here?
Mr. RAYBURN. Of course, where compensation is involved in the first instance, that would have to come to the bureau here, because that is the place where it is finally passed upon.
Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Well, in working out the details of this and getting the information, will they not have to have the soldier's files from the central office here sent to the regional office?
Mr. RAYBURN. If that is an active case; yes.
Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. And they must have the files here before final action can be taken?
Mr. RAYBURN. That is true.
Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. It seems to me here is a possibility of it being more complicated and requiring more time rather than less. I am for the thing that will help the soldier, and to get results, of course, with less red tape.
Mr. RAYBURN. I am, too, and it took me a long time to give my consent to supporting this bill at all, and I was finally convinced that it is a far better way to handle it than it is handled at this time. So many inquiries come to this bureau here, and so many of them get lost, that they can not take care of the business in a businesslike way, and in all probability if they have these information bureaus around over the country it will stop this writing to Washington, and if one of these subagencies was established in the several States a great many of the men could go to the subagencies and get the information complete to begin with. They could certainly go there and find all the forms and people to make them out, so that no mistake would be made.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. The complication seems to be that they would write to one office, and if they did not get results write to another.

Mr. RAYBURN. There is no question about that. It is a very complicated matter. I will say that I was a long time making up my mind that this was proper legislation.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. It will simplify the matter.

Mr. RAYBURN. It will simplify the matter and satisfy a great many dissatisfied people at the present time, and for that reason I decided to give it my support. And the only reason I took the floor was to say that I think it is good legislation and looking in the right direction.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. I am for it if I can be satisfied that it is going to help the soldier to get results.

Mr. RAYBURN. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS].

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of Members to the fact that it is not all letters and correspondence that is of importance. Here is a soldier that needs hospital treatment, and by the time he can write to Washington and get a letter back it is perhaps too late for him to go to a hospital. Maybe he is a tubercular patient, or possibly he has some disease that should require him to be isolated. With a subagent close by, he or his friends can see him and take the matter up in an advised and intelligent fashion. He can wire to the regional agency, and the regional agency can notify the nearest physician by wire to go right ahead and examine the applicant for relief. He can get a quick medical examination, and then can be sent immediately to the nearest hospital, and all of these orders can be made by telegraph.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLACK. As I understand it, so far as the physical examination is concerned, that is now under the jurisdiction of the Public Health Service. They have these regional boards, and I think it is very wise they do have them, but I am wondering if there would be any advantage in establishing these regional offices and suboffices for the purpose of taking care of the clerical and detail work? I doubt the feasibility of that.

Mr. SIMS. There is already a considerable expense that has to be incurred by sending field agents to make examinations in person. These field agents can very largely be dispensed with by this bill if passed, and this would dispense with a great deal of expense that might be incurred by an agent going many miles to make a special examination of a single case. These regional agencies will do much that otherwise would have to be done here at Washington. Then the combining of the Public Health agencies with the bureau agencies will be a considerable saving by occupying rooms in the same building. They do not have to rent new quarters, and by combining as many Federal agencies as possible you can get good results. The doctor of the Public Health Service is right there, and there is somebody at the same place to make out proper applications and proper certifications, who by wiring can get the work done expeditiously and correctly, and in that way you can reduce the expenses of the bureau here at Washington.

A letter written from Seattle or San Francisco by an inexperienced person comes here to the director. And then he finds something that requires the return of that letter all the way back to Seattle or San Francisco, and it may have to go three or four times back and forth, and may take five or six weeks in writing back and forth, when if there was a regional office, with the subagents right there in the soldier's own town, he could go there and everything would be attended to in shipshape and good order, and in one-fifth of the time get the same results that would be eventually secured by correspondence with the central bureau here in Washington.

Mr. HOWARD. I agree with the gentleman that we should have better facilities, but what is the necessity of adding on additional red tape by having a regional office and another office in the same State? Why not cut out the regional office and deal direct with these people?

Mr. SIMS. We have some regional offices anyway.

Mr. HOWARD. What is the necessity for this?

Mr. SIMS. The regional office can prepare the case before turning it over to the bureau here, and in this it will greatly expedite the work.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SIMS. Will the gentleman yield me five minutes more?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee is recognized for five minutes more.

Mr. SIMS. We establish offices everywhere where the postal business has to be attended to. Why not have these subagencies wherever they are needed when it will not cost one additional cent more, and thereby secure greater convenience and greater expedition and with less room for fraud? This great cry about 14 new bureaus is all "sound and fury," and nothing else.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. STEVENSON. I want to ask the gentleman about these bureaus. Let us get down to the practical features of this question. Suppose you start a claim at a suboffice. You have got to have the soldier's record, and is not this headquarters here in Washington the place to get the record of his enlistment and his service and his condition when discharged? Will you not have to come to Washington to get that, naturally?

Mr. SIMS. Oh, that does not have to begin with an initial inquiry.

Mr. STEVENSON. Is not that correct?

Mr. SIMS. There will be a subagency where the soldier can go for information and start right, without having to wait three or four weeks to get it from the central bureau at Washington before making a start.

Mr. STEVENSON. Is he going to start it through one of these regional boards or start it here?

Mr. SIMS. He will start it with the subagent, who will communicate with the regional board, and, if necessary, it will communicate with Washington. But a great deal of time will be saved by the use of the telephone and the telegraph, and there will be no increase of cost on the whole.

Now, this is an administrative bill.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. STEVENSON. I wish to ask another question, and then I am through. Is it not a fact that the same reason prevailed for establishing pension agencies all over the country that is put forward for establishing these regional bureaus, and did not Congress finally abolish all of those pension agencies, and has not the work been done much better by having it all done in Washington than it was done before?

Mr. SIMS. What did the pension agency do? It simply sent out checks sent to it from Washington. This is another matter entirely. The old pension agencies did nothing but mail out checks that were sent to them from Washington.

Mr. STEVENSON. Did they not have these investigations made as to bona fides?

Mr. SIMS. Oh, there are medical boards in each county to examine applicants as to their physical condition, but boards of that kind were not "pension agencies."

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. JUUL. The gentleman said that all this could be done without additional cost. I am mighty anxious to find out the method.

Mr. SIMS. Well, I have tried to tell you three or four times, and I will tell you again. The present method of administration is the most expensive method that can be used. The expense connected with it can not be reduced so long as all the work has to be done by one bureau in Washington. The expense here can be reduced by not having all this business done here. The cost of living is not so great in the country towns as it is in this city. By the provisions of this bill we will get rapid, quick, satisfactory, and economical administration, which will be absolutely impossible without some legislation along the line of this bill.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. HOWARD. Does the gentleman mean to say that the creation of 14 regional offices and an additional office in each State, with all its overhead expenses and all its appointees, will be cheaper than maintaining one central office here in Washington?

Mr. SIMS. I tried to show the gentleman that that will not take place. The regional office will be in a town where there is already a Government building. They will not have to rent a new building in which to install the regional office. They will simply divide up the capacity of that building and have the regional officers occupy some of it. The subagent will simply have a desk in the Federal building, without perhaps one cent of additional expense.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. RAYBURN. Is anybody opposing the bill on that side?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I would like to have five minutes.

Mr. RAYBURN. I first yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. McKEOWN] five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, this bill ought to be amended so as to fix the salaries of these officials. If you are going to create these bureaus, the salaries ought to be fixed.

Now, here is what they want the regional bureaus for: The regional bureaus will create positions where they will get better salaries than they will receive in the subbureaus, and for that reason we should put in here a provision to limit the salaries.

Now, you will have high-priced, high-salaried officials in the 14 bureaus, and then you will have smaller salaries provided for the agents in the States or substations. This legislation is legislation that is said to be needed for the purpose of creating a place where the soldier can get first-hand information.

The soldiers have received the impression from their experience that this Bureau of War Risk Insurance does not afford them the relief that was promised them by Congress. As I understand this legislation, the main purpose is to create a place where the soldier can go and get first-hand information. If that is true, then you have no business to create regional offices, but you should give him the suboffice in the State, so that he can go to his own State office and get this information.

Mr. HOWARD. Will it not result in creating three offices to which he has got to go to get information instead of one, and thus delay him?

Mr. McKEOWN. It makes red tape, and the complaint against the bureau now is red tape and delay.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. McKEOWN. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CANNON. Is it not true that the subagent and the regional agent have not the records, but that they are here in Washington?

Mr. McKEOWN. That is true.

Mr. CANNON. Afterwards these records will be in the capital of the State, but now they would have to ask Washington for the information.

Mr. McKEOWN. It will just make a delay in correspondence between the subagent and the regional agent, when the correspondence could go directly from the subagent to Washington and save the time occupied in correspondence between the subagent and the regional agent. It creates more delay.

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKEOWN. I yield to the gentleman on the committee.

Mr. BARKLEY. In reply to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], I should like to say that the military records of these soldiers are not requested or obtained by the War Risk Insurance Bureau from the War Department until all the other papers are made up and completed, and therefore it is not necessary to have those records scattered out over the country or to ask the department here in Washington for them until the subagent and the regional agent have sent in the papers to the Bureau of War Risk Insurance complete.

Mr. McKEOWN. The primary purpose of this legislation is to give information to the soldier, and the soldier can get that information in his State better by going to the suboffice than he can by waiting for the information to come from the regional office.

Mr. MacCRATE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKEOWN. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MacCRATE. Is it not a fact that the great delay in many cases now is because the War Risk Bureau has to send to the War Department and the Navy Department for the records?

Mr. McKEOWN. That is one of the causes of delay, and another cause of delay is the fact that the applications of the soldiers are not properly fixed up, are not in proper form; and if you create a subagency in the State where the soldier can get the information and get his papers fixed up correctly, he will save time, and a great deal of correspondence will be saved that is now necessary in sending the papers back to get them corrected.

I say, gentlemen, that in this bill you are throwing money away when you create these regional offices, and it is your duty as Members of this House to fix the compensation of these officers and to say how much they shall receive. [Applause.]

Mr. RICKETTS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKEOWN. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. RICKETTS. I want to ask the gentleman if he is not aware of the fact that the Red Cross now has agencies established in every county in the United States, where information can be obtained by the soldiers for the asking?

Mr. McKEOWN. The Red Cross in its home-service sections in every county seat throughout the country has been rendering wonderful and splendid service along this line.

Mr. RAYBURN. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN].

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, unfortunately I did not hear the address of my colleague [Mr. SWEET] in opening the debate on this bill. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] states that at first he was opposed to this proposition, but that he had finally succeeded in convincing himself that the bill was a good one. I have not got that far yet.

It is absolutely idle to talk about this bill not costing the Government of the United States any money. It starts out with the appropriation of $1,000,000, and it will never get through with less than $5,000,000 or $6,000,000. You propose to appoint regional officers over the country and then to appoint, as some gentlemen seem to think will be done, and I suppose will be done, subagents in the States, and then you say that this is not going to cost the Government anything! How is it possible to appoint such a multitude of agents without adding to the expense? All of these regional offices also will have to have quarters and a staff of clerks.

Why, it is out of the question. And what will it save? It will save nothing, because all the applications have got to come to Washington eventually and have got to be passed on here. In fact, it will add to the expense. Gentlemen say the soldier will be helped to make out the forms. I ask the Members of the House here—there has been a world of delay in getting the applications, but did you ever know a delay on account of the form on which the application was made? If you do, you know of an instance which I have never met. The delay has been because the office here or the health offices scattered over various States have failed to act on the application. You have now in various parts of the State the offices of the Public Health Service where the applicant is examined. You have the Red Cross service stations, which will give the soldier full information in regard to any matter. And what else does he need?

Mr. RICKETTS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. RICKETTS. Under the practice of the War Risk Bureau they have a physician appointed in each county in every State in the United States whose duty it is to examine applicants for insurance or relief. The doctors make the examination, make report to Washington, to the medical staff of the War Risk Bureau in Washington. In many instances the staff disapproves of the recommendation of the local physician, and that has had a lot to do with the delay.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman is correct, the delay has been everything else except the reasons that have been assigned. It has not been in the form of the application, because no form is required and none need be. The trouble has been either the health officer did not examine the man soon enough or when the report got here it was a month or so before the staff got around to it, and when they got around to it perhaps they wanted more information or disapproved of it, and yet the health officer knew perfectly well what was required and all that was necessary and could give this man every bit of information he needed. So I do not see any need for this. The delays which have occurred are by reason of administrative inefficiency. The application of the soldier is shunted from one official to another, but this bill does not tend to prevent that; it simply provides some more officers through whose hands the application must pass, and in the end the final determination will be here in Washington. I do not see any reason for the bill whatever. I can not see that it would help the soldier a particle, and I can seen plainly that it will cost somewhere from $1,000,000 appropriated here to $5,000,000 or $6,000,000. As to reducing the work, it will simply increase the work, because these officers will make their report, and they will send it here to be approved. It will make more delays and more work and certainly increase the cost to an enormous extent. [Applause.]

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS].

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I want the attention of my friend from Iowa, who has just left the floor, and others who are impressed the same way he is. I have been engaged for two months listening to testimony from applicants for rehabilitation work. There is one universal complaint coming from the soldier, and corroborated by other witnesses, namely, delay in reaching the final adjustment of his case. He indicated what the delays are. He first went to one office and then he would be sent to another and from there not infrequently to another office to be examined and to still another office, and then his papers would have to be sent to Washington. Later on they would come back and he would have to go over it again. They would say, "You will have to have another examination." Men have stated to our committee that seven and eight visits were made. Very often the case is brought where a rating was given which on review would be changed. He would have originally been rated one way and later upon some new development he is rated another way. The one constant disturbance was inconvenience in the scattered authority to be consulted. We have had before our committee such men as Mr. Wickersham, who is not only an official but who was identified with the war work overseas. He has made a recommendation as to the changes that ought to be made. This centralization was one to cure unnecessary delays. Other men of the type of Mr. McMurtrie recommended the same thing. Such people as Mrs. Wendell Phillips, who is closely identified with the work up in New York as head of the Carry On Club, and Mrs. Jacobs, formerly of the Red Cross, recommended it. In every case we have the statement that there is undue delay in not having unity, which, necessarily, involved needless travel around in order to get the final adjustment. The board has acted on this line, and we are told that delays are quite different now. All of these agencies in the New York office are now under one roof to avoid this tiresome, fatiguing delay, and enable the soldier who is waiting to be given the final statement as to what he is eligible to get without having to travel over blocks to find his rights under the law. That has been done, as I understand it, in most offices, and especially in the Philadelphia office and the New York office.

Another recommendation is to avoid the tardiness of reaching final decisions occasioned by so much red tape which required district officers to send everything for final adjustment to Washington. That inevitably caused delay. To correct this palpable mistake the office here at Washington seized upon what it thought was its right under the law without waiting for any command from Congress and gave to the local district vocational officers the power to say finally whether he is to get the training or not. Only a few exceptional cases are not included. That has eliminated largely the complaint of matters of delay.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. I would like to know if it is not the information that this delay is a matter of administration and not such as really requires legislation?

Mr. FESS. I think in the particular case that we had up that that is true, because they have been corrected since without any further legislation.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. It occurs to me that the danger of allowing these 14 regional officers sole power of discretion in determining what shall be done lies in the fact that you might have one office administered with care and good judgment, and, on the other hand, you might have one that was administered loosely. You would have no uniformity.

Mr. FESS. I can imagine that there might be something in that statement; but if gentlemen had been placed in the position that our committee has been placed in for two months, listening persistently to testimony of soldiers, there would not be any hesitancy in doing away with the possibility of all delay. We know definitely that delays were suffered. They have been greatly relieved by the change. I commend this legislation for similar relief in the war-risk work.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I now yield to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. SINNOTT].

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, in the coming Republican primary in Oregon on May 21 I have as an opponent an unusual personage, a rara avis, seldom seen or heard, a prevaricating parson [applause], who is distributing an ambiguous, anonymous circular which mendaciously misrepresents not only myself but 196 Republicans who voted as I did, and also many Democratic Members as well, of the Sixty-fourth Congress. This circular also mendaciously misrepresents many of the Republicans of the Sixty-fifth Congress as well as many Democrats. I would not dignify this circular with a notice did it not impute disloyalty to my Government. In the proper circles this gentleman is an advocate of Government ownership and operation of railroads. He was therefore the honor guest at the banquet given to the Plum Plan League speaker at Baker, Oreg., on March 18 last. In agricultural sections he "soft-pedals" on Government ownership and operation of railroads and "goes in on high" to advertise his membership in the Farmers' Union. [Laughter and applause.] The Farmers' Union, as well as the National Grange, resolved against Government ownership and operation of the railroads, and petitioned Congress to return the railroads. I voted for the return of the railroads in accordance with the petition of the Farmers' Union, the National Grange, as well as other farm organizations. I want to take this occasion to expose this imposter. [Applause.] I want to insert in the RECORD this ambiguous, anonymous circular, and my answer to the same. My opponent may ride either horse alone—Government operation and ownership of railroads or private ownership. He may ride the Plumb Plan League horse alone or he may ride the horse of the Farmers' Union and National Grange alone, but he can not ride both horses at once, even though he were the Colossus of Rhodes; the spread is too great. He can not thus deceive the farmers of my district. He can not alienate my many friends among the railroad men by any such duplicity. The Members of this House, familiar with the legislation referred to, on reading the circular, which I shall print in the RECORD, will readily see that the reverend gentleman believes in the precepts of those—

Who prove their doctrine orthodox
By apostolic blows and knocks.

You will find him strong on the "knocks." [Applause and laughter.]

The following is the circular referred to, also my answer:

What has your Congressman accomplished in the past administration? When the administration asked for additional power to stamp out German intrigue, the espionage act was drawn up. He voted against it. When it had passed the House and Senate and a committee had reported on a conference between the House and Senate as to the final form of the measure, he voted against it again.

When the administration asked for authority to arm American merchant ships against submarines, COOPER of Wisconsin tried to block the bill. He moved to send the armed neutrality bill back to the committee with instructions that it be amended to provide that no ships carrying war supplies should be armed in defense of submarines. Your Representative voted in favor of COOPER'S motions.

When the revenue bill was up for consideration February 1, 1917, he voted, with many others, to send it back to the committee in an effort to block it. Later, the effort failing, he voted against the bill on passage.

Without the revenue bills the Government would not have had funds for the first year of the war.

December, 1919, he voted to adjourn to prevent consideration of the Federal farm-loan act, to which several amendments had been offered.

The big thing up to the American public now is cooperation in an effort to secure just representation. Have we had such during the term of our present Representative?

Look into the life history and past record of Owen F. Jones and convince yourself that it is your duty to support a true western farmer, who has made a life study of conditions affecting both public and labor. A man who has the indorsement of all farm and labor organizations throughout the State. A man of pleasing personality and a determination that conditions affecting the voting public of this district shall be improved.

A man who stands for Government operation and control of private monopolies.

Nominate Owen F. Jones at the coming primaries.

Answer.

MAY 12, 1920.

JUDD S. FISH, The Dalles, Oreg.

MY DEAR JUDD: I am just in receipt of the inclosed unsigned, anonymous circular, which I am informed was surreptitiously circulated among railroad men in The Dalles in violation of section 3519 of the Oregon corrupt practices act, coincident with the arrival in The Dalles of my opponent, the Rev. Owen F. Jones.

This circular, full of false statements and false conclusions, is a mere rehash, with one exception, the reference to the farm-loan act, of the propaganda put out by the Democratic national congressional committee at the last election, in November, 1918, which resulted in the election of an overwhelming majority of Republicans to the House of Representatives.

The first paragraph, referring to the espionage act, does not state the truth. I voted in favor of the final form of this act. The original bill contained a provision muzzling the press and gagging the public. The first conference report was worse than the original bill. It would have prevented such exposures as Senator CHAMBERLAIN made of the deplorable condition in our Army camps and hospitals, as well as the failure to supply our troops with proper clothing.

I voted with my colleagues, Congressmen HAWLEY and MCARTHUR, against this conference report, which was defeated by a vote of 184 to 144 and sent back to conference. This vote was not, however, on the final form of the conference report, as is falsely stated in the circular. By direction of the House this conference report was modified in conference by eliminating the provisions muzzling the press and gagging the public. When it came back to the House it was adopted practically without opposition, and I voted for it.

The second paragraph, referring to the Cooper amendment, prior to our entry into the war, likewise contains false statements and inferences. The armed neutrality bill authorized the President to supply merchant ships with defensive arms. However, it was not designed to authorize the President to arm merchant ships carrying war supplies, for while merchant ships carrying war supplies could arm themselves, the arming of such ships by the United States Government would be an act in violation of our neutrality. The bill was open to the construction that the President could in violation of law arm ships carrying contraband or war supplies. This would be an act of war. Such an act on the part of the President would virtually be a declaration of war, a power under the Constitution lodged only in Congress. This was admitted by the proponents of the bill, but they said we could rely upon the President not violating the law, and that it was not necessary to adopt the Cooper amendment, as that would be merely writing into the bill the provisions of international law.

The advocates of the Cooper amendment contended that the matter should be made certain by incorporating into the bill the prohibition against the Government arming ships carrying contraband. Among those voting for the Cooper amendment was Congressman Kent, of California. The President surely did not think that Kent was trying to block the bill, for shortly afterwards he appointed him a member of the Federal Trade Commission. Among others who voted for the Cooper amendment were Representative JOHNSON of Washington, who enlisted in the service and became a captain; Representative ROYAL JOHNSON, of South Dakota, who enlisted, and as a commissioned officer was wounded in France while going "over the top"; also my colleague, Mr. HAWLEY, and Congressman PORTER, then ranking Republican member of the Foreign Relations Committee and now chairman of that committee in the House.

The Cooper amendment was defeated and the bill passed the House practically without opposition on the assurance that the laws of neutrality would not be violated by the President, and I voted for it. The armed neutrality bill, to which the Cooper amendment was offered, did not pass the Senate, and the President on April 2, 1917, asked for a declaration of war and abandoned the armed neutrality plan, saying to Congress:

"When I addressed the Congress on the 26th of February last, I thought it would suffice to assert our neutral rights with arms, our right to use the seas against unlawful interference, our right to keep our people safe against unlawful violence. But armed neutrality, it now appears, is impracticable. * * * Armed neutrality is ineffectual enough at best; in such circumstances and in the face of such pretentions it is worse than ineffectual; it is likely only to produce what it was meant to prevent; it is practically certain to draw us into the war without either the rights or the effectiveness of belligerents."

We then declared war. I voted for the declaration, and for all measures designed to win the war.

If you are further interested in the issues involved in the Cooper amendment I am inclosing herewith extracts from the debate in the Senate and House.

The third paragraph of the circular, referring to the vote on the revenue bill, February 1, 1917, would be laughable were it not that it contains the insinuation that there was an attempt to prevent the Government raising revenues to carry on the war.

When this bill was considered on February 1, 1917, Congressman FORDNEY, then ranking Republican member of the Ways and Means Committee, and now chairman of that committee, offered a motion to put into the bill a provision to raise a part of the revenues by a protective tariff. Every Republican in the House except one, who voted "present," voted for this motion which was defeated, and immediately thereafter every Republican present in the House except three who did not vote—196 in number—voted against the bill in an effort to force a tariff provision into the bill.

I regret that my opponent sees fit to impugn the loyalty to their Government of the other 195 Republicans, whom he now seeks to associate with, as most of them are still in the House.

The reference to the amendments to the Federal farm loan act is not clear, as that act was not under consideration in the House in December, 1919. I wish the author of the anonymous circular had been more specific.

Perhaps he refers to an amendment considered in the House on March 2, 1920, which was defeated by the overwhelming vote of 206 to 104. All the Members from agricultural States interested in the farm loan act voted against the amendment. My colleague, Mr. HAWLEY, of the first Oregon district, a member of the committee which drafted the act, voted as I did, against the amendment.

This amendment woud have given the Farm Loan Bureau in Washington control over the assessments of the local associations. The amendment having been defeated, the bill went to conference, where the amendment was modified in a manner satisfactory to the friends of the farm loan act, on April 13, by giving the local association authority to levy assessments.

I have always been a friend of the farm loan act—voted for it when it first passed—and I don't think anyone will be influenced by this ambiguous, anonymous insinuation.

I note from the circular that my opponent "stands for Government operation and control of private monopolies," and in this connection he states he has the indorsement of all farm organizations throughout the State. This I doubt.

If he has any such indorsement, it was obtained without disclosing this Government-ownership plank, for the Farmers' Union, the American Farm Bureau Federation, the National Grange have all passed resolutions opposing Government ownership, and the Association of State Farmers' Union Presidents on January 29, 1920, petitioned Congress to return the railroads. The above farm organizations will surely not support a candidate who has a platform so at variance with their petitions and resolutions, and who, according to his home paper and supporter, the Baker Herald, of March 18 last, was the guest of honor at the Plumb Plan League speakers' banquet, of Baker, Oreg.

I thank you for giving me this opportunity to reply to this anonymous circular, sprung at a late date in the campaign. If you learn of any more such propaganda—and some doubtless will be sprung at the last moment—I wish you would wire me at my expense.

Sincerely, yours, N. J. SINNOTT.

[Extracts from debates and CONGRESSIONAL RECORD showing issues involved in the Cooper amendment.]

Congressman PORTER, then ranking Republican member of the committee which reported the bill, in support of the Cooper amendment, argued that the arming of merchant ships carrying war supplies would be an act of war. In this connection he said, March 1, 1917:

"I shall not pursue this matter further, as I am informed the proponents of this bill concede this to be a correct statement of the law, but reply that the President will not allow the ships protected under the terms of this act to carry arms and ammunition. Why give to him in this crisis a power which he does not intend to exercise?"

Congressman COOPER, author of the amendment, said on March 1, 1917:

"Private individuals or corporations may, without violating international law or any law of the United States, sell and deliver arms and ammunition to a country at war or to any of its citizens, but it is a far different thing which this bill proposes, for it would authorize the President to make the Government itself a party to the traffic in arms and ammunition with belligerents, although when a Government becomes a party to such traffic it thereby commits a deliberate act of war.

"The bill is an attempt in effect to yield to the President a part of the constitutional power of Congress to declare war."

Congressman FLOOD, Democrat, chairman of the committee reporting the bill and in charge of the bill on the floor, said March 1, 1917:

"I do not believe that the President intends to convoy merchant vessels that carry munitions of war or to supply guns and ammunition to such vessels. Good international lawyers contend that to convoy a vessel loaded with arms and ammunition is an unlawful act; that it is an act of war."

Senator FALL, Republican, member of the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate, said in the Senate on March 3, 1917:

"If the Nation itself, by its aid and assistance, in any way assists the person dealing in contraband to avoid the natural consequences of this act, it commits an unneutral act," citing Moore's International Law Digest.

Senator HITCHCOCK, Democrat, chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate and in charge of the bill, said on the floor of the Senate March 4, 1917:

"It is not proposed in this bill to authorize the President of the United States to violate the laws of neutrality, and the President of the United States could neither arm vessels loaded with munitions of war for one of the belligerents, nor could he convoy vessels loaded with munitions of war for one of the belligerents without violating the neutrality of the United States."

On the same day Senator HITCHCOCK further stated:

"I would be immeasurably chagrined if the United States Government should do anything either to insure or to protect the transportation of munitions of war to any of the belligerents in Europe to continue the destructive conflict there, and I have satisfied myself by inquiry at Government sources that our Government has been scrupulous to observe the laws of neutrality, which prohibits it from doing anything to facilitate or protect or insure the transportation of munitions of war to any belligerent country. * * * The Government has been scrupulous not to violate the rules of neutrality. * * * The amendment would be a reflection upon the President."

Senator LODGE, Republican, and ranking member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, now chairman of that committee, said, on March 2, 1917:

"Mr. President, in my opinion for us to arm a vessel loaded with contraband or to convoy a vessel loaded with contraband would be an act of war. I voted against that amendment in the committee, and it seemed to me going very far to say to the President that he must not commit an act of war. He is as well aware of what constitutes an act of war as we are, and I feel very sure that if the President were ready to make war and thought the time had come for that action he would call Congress together, if it were not in session, and that in any event he would submit it to Congress. * * *

"If you put officers of the Navy or men on a merchant ship you change her character—you make her a merchant auxiliary; you take her into the Navy of the United States; you make her a vessel of war pro tanto. * * * The President in any event must know whether the vessel contains contraband, and he must find out through the officers of the Government. * * * I said he had no right to do those things unless he was prepared to commit an act of war."

Senator LODGE further said:

"I think it is very undesirable when we are asked by the President to give him certain powers to accompany the authority with the statement that he must not do that which he knows he can not do without committing an act of war and going beyond his constitutional powers."

Senator LODGE still further said:

"If we deliberately, as a Government, put arms on a vessel carrying contraband, and we know it is carrying contraband, of course it is an act of war. I take it that any vessel which is armed by the Government will be subjected to careful examination by the officers of the United States to make sure that she is not carrying contraband and that her cargo and voyage are lawful. * * *

"I do not think it is necessary to put international law into the bill."

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LEHLBACH, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 13558) to amend the war-risk insurance act, and had come to no resolution thereon.

CONFERENCE REPORT—FORTIFICATIONS APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, at the request of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SLEMP], I present herewith a conference report on the bill (H. R. 13555) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, and so forth, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, for printing under the rule.

LEAVES OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted:

To Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas, for to-day, on account of illness.

To Mr. WALTERS, for five days, on account of business.

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Saturday next, after the reading of the Journal and the disposition of business on the Speaker's table, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. UPSHAW] may be recognized for one hour in which to address the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. BROOKS of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I have two communications in my hand bearing on the postal situation which I wish to bring before the Members of the House by inserting them in the RECORD, and I ask unanimous consent to do so.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what is the nature of the communication?

Mr. BROOKS of Pennsylvania. The communications that I have received are upon the postal situation.

Mr. GARD. What phase of the postal situation?

Mr. BROOKS of Pennsylvania. With regard to the commission that has been appointed by Congress to take testimony in respect to increase of salaries.

Mr. GARD. Are the communications from private individuals or organizations?

Mr. BROOKS of Pennsylvania. One is from the Chamber of Commerce of Hanover and the other is from the postal employees of the city of York, Pa.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I have received, I think, at least 75 letters on this general subject within the last two days. If we begin to place these letters in the RECORD we will increase the shortage of paper very materially. I feel that I must object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to make a brief statement.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent to address the House for a few minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, a number of gentlemen have asked as to the program for to-morrow. My understanding is that the conference report on the Agricultural bill will be brought up the first thing in the morning, and that following that the conference report on the so-called Kelley bill—the Army and Navy pay-increase bill—will probably be called up. If, however, it is not deemed wise to call up that bill to-morrow afternoon, a rule will probably be presented for the consideration of a bill relating to the farm-loan act, extending the law under which the Federal Government has purchased certain farm-loan bonds.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What are we going to do on Friday?

Mr. MONDELL. In case the farm-loan bill is not taken up to-morrow or not disposed of to-morrow it will be taken up on Friday, and there are several other rules that are to follow this, one of which is likely to be taken up. The conference report on the fortification bill will be taken up at an early date.

PAPERS, ETC., IN CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE, TENTH DISTRICT, PENNSYLVANIA.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Clerk of the House of Representatives transmitting papers, testimony, and documents relating to the contested-election case in the tenth district, State of Pennsylvania, which was referred to the Committee on Election No. 1 and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Friday, after the reading of the Journal, that the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] shall have the privilege of addressing the House for 30 minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, for the present I shall have to object. We can not make too many of these special orders. I was prevailed on not to object to the request made a while ago, but I do not feel I am justified in allowing too many special orders to be made at this time.

Mr. GARD. Is there anything to do on Friday except——

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, yes; we will have considerable to do on Friday. I think there will be no difficulty about the gentleman having his half hour on Friday, but I do not think we ought to make a special order.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 41 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, May 13, 1920, at 12 o'clock noon.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, May 13, 1920.

(Legislative day of Tuesday, May 11, 1920.)

The Senate reassembled at 12 o'clock noon, on the expiration of the recess.

The Vice President being absent, the President pro tempore took the chair.

TERMINATION OF THE WAR WITH GERMANY.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 327) terminating the state of war declared to exist April 6, 1917, between the Imperial German Government and the United States, permitting on conditions the resumption of reciprocal trade with Germany, and for other purposes.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I wish to state that the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] is absent in attendance upon a meeting of the Committee on Manufactures.

Mr. GERRY. The Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] and the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] are absent on official business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Sixty-five Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, hostilities ceased on November 11, 1918. Thus ended the greatest war of ancient or modern times. From the conquests of Alexander, shrouded in the mist of passing time, to our own Rebellion, none, or all together, equaled the struggle of contending nations upon the theater of Europe, involving nearly all the civilized world. But the end came at last. Exhausted Europe laid down its arms. The salvos of victory were hushed in the face of this appalling calamity; governments were wrecked; nations dismembered; industries destroyed; lands laid waste; whole nations plunged into disorder and anarchy; want, disease, and starvation were general throughout central and eastern Europe. The whole machinery of industry, exchange, transportation, and government was disorganized. People were dazed and almost hopeless before the task of reconstruction and readjustment.

Under these conditions the council met at Versailles, composed of the leading statesmen of Europe and the Chief Executive of the United States. To them, and especially to the latter, the eyes of the millions of war-weary people were turned. Hope for a moment was revived. There was need for immediate action. Germany had been defeated and crushed, but Europe was crushed with it. No time was to be lost if governments were to be revived, universal anarchy stopped, industry restored, and the march of starvation halted. When the Allies had upon the Rhine 5,000,000 men under arms they should have written the terms of peace for the defeated nations at once and restored their governments while they had the men and the power to enforce these terms. But months passed and nothing was done. The allied armies dwindled away, power ceased at Versailles, the great council of nations degenerated into a debating society, while despairing Europe looked on in amazement. No wonder starving people asked what this was all for. No wonder Germany, Austria, Turkey, and Bulgaria took heart and commenced their plotting and scheming as before. It is inconceivable that more than eight months should have elapsed before a treaty of peace was signed and more than a year before it was put in force. And during all this time the disintegrating effects on the great victory were working. It took but a few days to write an armistice. It should have taken less than a month to enlarge it into the principal articles of peace, to be signed by the belligerent nations, and thus end the state of war.

But this was not done. The President insisted that the League of Nations should be a part of the treaty of peace, and because the majority of the Republicans in the Senate had criticized the proposed league and had suggested changes, because it did not safeguard American interests, the President returned to France stubbornly insisting that he would so intertwine the league in the whole treaty that it could never be separated. Months were then consumed in perfecting a League of Nations for the future, which should have been left for deliberate and careful consideration after the emergency of peace had passed.

It is a fact that when the President returned to France, nearly five months after the armistice was signed, the members of the allied council had determined upon the policy of making a treaty of peace and afterwards taking time to frame a league of nations. But, against the advice of his associates, ignoring the crying need of the world for peace, with an obstinate disregard of the demands of his countrymen, the President insisted that the League of Nations must be a part of the treaty of peace, and insisted that it should be accepted by the American people, without regard to their judgment or the judgment of the Senate, created by the Constitution to pass upon this question.

What is the result? Eighteen months have elapsed since hostilities actually ceased and the war in fact ended, and this country, the most powerful, comprised of the greatest English-speaking people, is still in an actual, legal state of war with the Central Powers. Trade and commerce—except to a very limited extent, carried on surreptitiously through neutral countries or under license from the President—are inhibited. Travel and intercourse, communication and exchange, are restricted.

The Senator from Nebraska has stated that trade is now being carried on with Germany. This is perhaps true in a limited sense; but under the trading-with-the-enemy act all trade between German and American nationals is absolutely prohibited, "except with the license of the President granted to such persons." It is legally impossible, of course, to resume trade while such a law is in existence.

I wish to call the Senator's attention to the language of the President in his address before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee on August 19, 1919:

> The nations that ratify the treaty, such as Great Britain, Belgium, and France, will be in a position to lay their plans for controlling the markets of central Europe, without competition from us, if we do not presently act. We have no consular agents, no trade representatives, there to look after our interests.

I invite the attention of the Senator from Nebraska to this fact. It is useless to say even that the American people may trade with Germany if they have not the machinery in Germany and in the Central Empires to foster and promote trade.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBINSON in the chair). Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield for a question.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I will say to the Senator from Minnesota that after leaving the Senate Chamber yesterday afternoon I looked up the figures of our trade with Germany, as given me by the Department of Commerce, running from January, 1919, to the 1st of April, and I find that our exports to Germany during that time were $146,000,000.

Mr. KELLOGG. I have no doubt of that; but the Senator from Nebraska knows very well that that is not the trade we should have with Germany; and he also knows very well that we can not resume trade relations completely without consular agents and trade representatives and without freedom of travel and communication between this country and Germany.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. If the Senator please, I think the difficulty in establishing trade with Germany now is more economic than it is political. The difficulty is that Germany during that period was only able to export to us some $25,000,000 worth of goods, and she had no means of paying for any larger amount of goods which she might purchase of us. I repeat, it is an economic difficulty that Germany is suffering under. She is not able to pay for much. Her trade with Great Britain is very limited, and so is her trade with France.

Mr. KELLOGG. I might add that undoubtedly those exports to Germany include the exports sent under Government regulation for the relief of the German people.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President——

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LENROOT. I should like to remind the Senator from Minnesota that such exports as we now have are only permitted by license of the President.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield to the Senator from Montana for a question.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Minnesota if this legislation should be enacted whether we would then have consular agents in Germany?

Mr. KELLOGG. If the President does not veto or nullify the resolution.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Suppose the President approves the legislation, would we then be entitled to have consular agents in Germany?

Mr. KELLOGG. It simply rests with the President to appoint them, with Germany's consent; and I have no doubt Germany would consent.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is the point I am making, that we should have to get Germany's consent in order that such agents might officiate in German territory.

Mr. KELLOGG. I have no doubt Germany would be very glad to consent.

Mr. President, the laws granting to the President extraordinary and autocratic war powers are still in existence. Our products can only reach the starving people of Central Europe in a limited way, such commerce being carried on by the Government of the United States.

If we can not obtain a status of peace by the ratification of the treaty and the League of Nations, we must obtain it in some other way. It is evident that the treaty can not be ratified unless it is accepted exactly as the statesmen of Europe framed it and, through the President, presented to us, without any of the safeguards necessary to the protection of American rights. It is of the utmost importance that a status of peace be accomplished. There are more than 70,000,000 people in the Central Empires. They must be clothed and fed, their industries must be revived, they must labor and produce and trade with other nations. England, France, and Italy have made peace with them; diplomatic and consular relations have been restored; trade has been resumed. England to-day is sending her raw materials to German factories, where they are being made into finished products by German industry and returned into the channels of English commerce. Her trade, her foreign commerce, is fast increasing. Ours is dwindling. France, Italy, and all the neutral countries are restoring commercial relations with the Central Empires. We alone are left outside. Do we realize the fact that when the war broke out in 1914 our entire foreign commerce amounted to only $4,258,504,805, and that the balance of trade in favor of the United States was only $470,653,491? But in 1919 our foreign commerce exceeded $10,000,000,000—a greater foreign commerce than has ever heretofore been enjoyed by any nation in the history of the world—and the balance of trade in favor of this country was substantially $4,000,000,000. Our exports are rapidly decreasing and our imports increasing. Before the war the Central Empires were among the prinicpal customers of this country. We are a surplus producing nation. We have all the food products and the raw materials which Europe needs and which the industries of this country must furnish if we are to maintain the prosperity of the Nation. It is inconceivable that the President would sacrifice not only the interest and independence and sovereignty of the Nation, but sacrifice the material welfare of millions of people, by his autocratic and stubborn insistence on having his own way as to the League of Nations. Not only is it necessary to the industries of this country that a state of peace should be declared and our trade resumed with all belligerent countries, but it is important that the war powers of the President should cease.

During the war both the great political parties united in granting the President everything demanded—the most autocratic and far-reaching powers—in order to effectually carry on the war. Some of these powers seemed to be unnecessary and were granted because no one desired to withhold any power which the President deemed necessary to win the war. But the war is ended. The great industries of this country can not be run by meddling, bureaucratic officials in Washington, and yet the President is continuing some of these governmental agencies created for the emergency; he still continues to exercise war powers which were granted to enable us more effectively to carry on hostilities. And why? Because the great majority of the Senate deemed it wise to safeguard American interests with certain reservations which were acceptable to foreign powers and demanded by the American people. Those reservations were adopted for the purpose of making the league and the treaty conform to our constitutional principles of government, protecting the American people in their right to administer their affairs without the domination of foreign powers, relieving this country from the intolerable burden and obligation imposed by article 10, which would call American soldiers and American resources to the defense of any nation in the world, protecting American commerce, domestic questions, the Monroe doctrine, the inequality in voting power, and protecting American labor against foreign competition.

These reservations were not adopted by a strictly party vote. Every one of them received more than a two-thirds vote, or nearly two-thirds vote, of the Senate. The reservation which created the greatest interest among the American people and the greatest contest in the Senate—that as to article 10—protecting the American people from the demands of Europe to call their sons upon foreign battle fields, was adopted by more than two-thirds of the Senate, 14 Democrats voting for it.

I do not agree with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] that they did not safeguard American interests. I believe that with those reservations American interests were fully and completely safeguarded; that the League of Nations was then left as a concert of peoples to use their influence to prevent war; and that in principle the league, then, did not go beyond what this country undertook to accomplish in the Hague convention.

When these reservations left the great principles of the League of Nations intact; made this country a party to a council to use its influence to maintain the peace of the world; agreed to arbitration of justiciable questions, thereby removing the cause of war; left intact, in its main features, the treaty settling all the disputes between this country and Germany—reservations which were satisfactory to foreign powers—it is inconceivable that the President, standing practically alone, was willing to sacrifice the peace of this country, to injure our commerce, to jeopardize the stability of Europe, to gratify his personal ambition. He has thus ignored the great principles of representative democracy. The right of the people to vote through their representatives and to use their judgment in making treaties with foreign nations.

I shall not take the time of the Senate to again discuss the principles of the League of Nations and the treaty, for which I voted with the reservations. I voted for the treaty and the League of Nations, and would do so again, but never if American sons and American resources must be called at the behest of any foreign country to sustain the tottering and turbulent nations of Europe; never if we are to sacrifice the century-old Monroe doctrine, which has stabilized the Western Hemisphere; never if foreign countries can interfere in the domestic problems which are truly a part of our national ideals; never if foreign powers can interfere to bring American labor to the level of European and Asiatic; never if this country—composed of the greatest English-speaking people of the world—is to be denied an equal voice in the councils of the League of Nations. The President has iterated and reiterated his determination that the Senate abrogate its functions under the Constitution and accept the treaty exactly as it was presented to this country through the influence of foreign powers. He renews his statement in his letter to the Democratic central committee of his party in Oregon, and I invite the attention of the Senate to the first paragraph of this letter. He says:

> I think it imperative that the party should at once proclaim itself the uncompromising champion of the Nation's honor and the advocate of everything that the United States can do in the service of humanity; that it should, therefore, indorse and support the Versailles treaty and condemn the Lodge reservations as utterly inconsistent with the Nation's honor and destructive of the world leadership which it had established.

That is exactly the attitude the President has taken from the beginning.

Mr. President, let me ask the Senate if these reservations are really inconsistent with the Nation's honor.

Was it inconsistent to insist that the right of withdrawal inserted in the treaty should be clear?

Was it inconsistent with the Nation's honor to insist that no obligation should be imposed on this country to use its military and naval forces without the authority of Congress?

Was it inconsistent with the Nation's honor to insist that a mandate could only be accepted by the United States through the action of its Congress, or that the United States should have exclusive right to decide and control its purely domestic questions?

Was it inconsistent with the Nation's honor that the Monroe doctrine, recognized by the world for 100 years and necessary to the protection of this country, should be continued?

Was it inconsistent with the Nation's honor that we should refuse to ratify the infamous bargain of Shantung?

That Congress should provide for the appointment of its representatives upon the various committees and under the league and define their powers and duties?

To provide that the reparation commission should not control our exports to Germany?

To provide that no League of Nations should have the right to impose financial burdens on this country?

To provide that in case of war we should have the right to increase our armament for the protection of the Nation?

To provide that the United States should insist that American labor should not be brought to the level of European and Asiatic?

To provide that, as the greatest English-speaking nation of the world, we should be entitled to equal voting rights in the league and council, and should not be bound until the treaty was thus amended granting such rights?

Mr. President, these reservations were entirely consistent and necessary for the independence and the honor of this Nation.

The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] stated yesterday that the Republicans were to blame for the defeat of the treaty, because they refused to compromise. Referring to a statement of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] that the President intended to thwart the will of Congress, the Senator from Nebraska said:

> That really is delicious, Mr. President—
> Well, it may seem so to him—
> that the President of the United States, who for something like six months has been a bed-ridden invalid, much of that time in danger of his very life, has been devoting himself to thwarting the Senate and the Congress and the people in an effort to bring about peace.

Mr. President, no one sympathizes with the President in his affliction more than I do and more than every Member on this side of the Chamber; but his acts, his declarations, his writings, his domination, his directions to his party, are of record, and we are entitled to comment upon them.

The Senator from Nebraska continues:

> The fact is that the President of the United States, in the exercise of his constitutional power, his exclusive and sole constitutional power, negotiated a treaty; he brought it to the Senate; he asked for the consent of the Senate to its ratification; and the Senate failed to give that consent and sent it back to the White House. Who is thwarting, who is hindering, who is delaying, under those circumstances? The Senate did not give its consent. The Senate did not function, and it did not function because there was a deliberate refusal to compromise differences, as there might have been a compromise.

The Senator is a master of illogical statement. He says that the Senate did not function because it refused to accept a treaty which the President had presented just exactly as he and the diplomats of Europe had written it. To whom did the fathers of the country give the power to decide finally upon the terms of the treaty? Who is better qualified than the Representatives elected by the people to speak for a country reaching nearly 4,000 miles from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and nearly 2,000 miles from the Gulf to Canada? Is it thwarting the will of the people for the Senate of the United States, in its deliberate judgment, by a two-thirds majority in nearly every case, and nearly a two-thirds vote in every other case, to place upon this instrument reservations which safeguard American interests according to our Constitution, and according to the traditions of our Republic?

I fear that the power which was given him for prosecuting war, and willingly given, is in his mind to be continued in times of peace. I say that this treaty as it was finally considered by the Senate protects American interests, and fully measures up to our obligations in the great affairs of the world.

Furthermore, let me remind the Senator from Nebraska that reservations upon this treaty are matters of principle. They are not mere matters of trading, as in the case of a private contract. They represent the sovereign rights of 110,000,000 people.

But let me refer to the expressions of the President. When has he shown any willingness to compromise?

In his letter of March 8, 1920, he says:

I am sorry to say that the reservations that have come under my notice are, almost without exception, not interpretations of the article to which it is proposed to attach them but in effect virtual nullifications of those articles.

Any reservation which seeks to deprive the League of Nations of the force of article 10 cuts at the very heart and life of the covenant itself. Any league of nations which does not guarantee as a matter of incontestable right the political independence and integrity of each of its members might be hardly more than a futile scrap of paper.

Not a word of compromise.

Again, in his famous Jackson Day dinner letter, he said:

We can not rewrite this treaty. We must take it without changes which alter its meaning or leave it, and then, after the rest of the world has signed it, we must face the unthinkable task of making another and separate kind of treaty with Germany.

We must take it as it is written, although the leading nations of Europe expressed a willingness to accept the reservations adopted by a majority of the Senate after months of deliberate debate and consideration!

The President's last letter has clarified the issue. The issue is thus reached: Shall we adopt the League of Nations and the treaty, imperiling American interests, at the behest of the Executive, or shall we adopt the treaty with reservations, protecting American rights and American interests and promoting American aspirations?

On this issue all lovers of American liberty, American independence, believers in the destiny of this Nation, can appeal to the tribunal of public opinion with absolute confidence.

Mr. President, I come now to the question of the resolution declaring a state of peace. When resolutions of this character were originally introduced in the Senate, I was opposed to them. I wish that every opportunity be given for the ratification of the treaty. But the President has made this impossible. The time has come when something must be done. A legal state of peace must be restored, trade relations resumed, war powers ended, and the Nation as soon as possible returned to normal peace conditions.

I shall therefore vote for the resolution declaring the war at an end, which will restore our diplomatic, consular, and commercial relations with the Central Empires, because it seems to me to be the only possible way now of accomplishing this object. I have no doubt whatever of the constitutionality of the resolution. On this ultimate question of constitutionality I agree with the Senator from Pennsylvania, although my views do not coincide with all of his conclusions. I agree, of course, that war actually ceased and hostilities terminated with the signing of the armistice or the capitulation, whichever it may be called, on November 11, 1918. But so far as the German Government and its present successor and the American Government, as well as the nationals of the two Governments, are concerned a legal state of war exists and can only end by the ratification of a treaty or by some action of Congress repealing the war statutes or by the common consent of both nations. The latter can hardly occur with these statutes upon the books.

I am therefore of the opinion that either a treaty or a statute of Congress is necessary.

If we concede all of the Senator's argument about an actual state of peace, we still have on the statute books acts of Congress passed under the war powers of the Constitution granting to the President autocratic powers which must either cease through the signing of a treaty or by the action of Congress. There are about 30 of such statutes which continue during the war, or until the treaty of peace is signed, or a proclamation of the President, or some like occurrence. Of course, Congress, which passed these various acts, can repeal them or modify them, but the fact is that they exist as an aftermath of the war. They prohibit trade between nationals of this country and German nationals. They tie up property seized by the Alien Property Custodian. They continue the war bureaus and autocratic powers of the President.

Let us look at the provisions of some of these statutes. The act known as "the trading-with-the-enemy act," which prohibits trade with German nationals, is to continue during the war and end with the date of the proclamation and exchange of ratifications of the treaty of peace, unless the President shall, by proclamation, declare a prior date.

The food-control act provides that it shall cease to be in effect when the existing state of war between the United States and Germany shall have terminated.

The Overman Act is to remain in force during the continuance of the war and for six months after the termination of the war by the proclamation of the treaty of peace, and various other acts contain similar provisions.

There is no question that when a war actually comes to an end through surrender or an armistice or the cessation of hostilities that Congress has the power to continue a state of war for a reasonable time; that the President himself has no power whatever to create a legal status of peace. He can accept capitulations or create an armistice, but he alone is powerless to end a war which Congress has declared.

Mr. President, let us now consider the power of Congress, with the concurrence of the President, to declare war at an end. I am clearly of the opinion that, with the exception of the command of the Army and Navy conferred upon the President by the Constitution, Congress may exercise the sovereign power of the Nation not only to declare war, or to recognize a state of war as existing, and to make rules and regulations for the conduct of war, but to end war by declaring a state of peace.

The power of any nation to declare war, to take all necessary steps to prosecute it, and to protect the people in their Government, is inherent in every sovereign. There is nothing in the Constitution of the United States which limits this right, except the provision in the Constitution that no appropriation of money to that use shall be for a longer time than two years, and that the President shall be the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy. The provisions of the Constitution are as follows:

Article I, section 8, clause 11, of the Constitution confers upon the Congress the power "to declare war, grant letters of marque and reprisal, and make rules concerning captures on land and water."

Clause 12, "to raise and support armies, but no appropriation of money to that use shall be for a longer time than two years."

Clause 13, "to provide and maintain a navy."

Clause 14, "to make rules for the government and regulation of land and naval forces."

Congress therefore has power not only to declare war but to make the appropriations to support, and rules and regulations for the government of, the military and naval forces.

It is true that in the main the Constitution is a grant of power by the people to the Federal Government. But there are many provisions of the Constitution which constitute limitations upon the States and limitations upon the manner of exercising Federal powers. There can not, however, be drawn from this provision of the Constitution, conferring upon the Congress the power to declare war, any conclusion that it has not, as the representative body of a sovereign Nation, the power to declare a state of peace and to end the war. The power to declare peace is a natural and necessary implication in the absence of an express prohibition. It is clearly apparent from the constitutional debates that the object of conferring upon the Congress the power to declare war was that neither the President nor any other branch of the Government should exercise this greatest and most dangerous prerogative.

It was proposed by Mr. Pinckney in his plan for a constitution that "the Senate shall have the exclusive power to declare war," and the plan of Mr. Hamilton also provided that the Senate was to have such power. Various objections were made to the power being conferred upon the Congress—among others, that its proceedings were too slow. It would meet but once a year. The House of Representatives would be too numerous for such deliberations. Others urged that the power should be vested in the President. Mr. Mason, among others, objected to the power being conferred upon the Executive or the Senate, because it was too great a power to be intrusted to a single individual or a single branch of the Government. He favored clogging rather than facilitating the declaration of war. This plan was finally adopted.

The words "declare war" were chosen instead of "making war" because the President, as Commander in Chief, directs the Army and Navy and executes the orders of Congress during actual hostilities. It was undoubtedly unnecessary to confer this power upon Congress by a provision of the Constitution, for unless there was some limitation the right to prosecute a war for the preservation of the Nation would be inherent in the Federal Government, executed through its representatives and the President. Watson, in his work on the Constitution, said:

It would hardly seem necessary that the power to declare war should have been expressly conferred upon Congress. The exercise of such power would be necessary to the existence of a nation, and, therefore, a natural power, inherent as an element in the law of self-preservation, the justice of which is recognized by all nations. To declare war may be necessary to preserve the life or freedom of a people, and the right to make such a declaration certainly rests upon the basic principle of self-protection. A commentator on the Constitution, in writing of this power, says: "The right of making war belongs to a nation so far as it is necessary for their defense and support of their rights." It might be asked, If the right belongs to nations to declare war, why confer it upon a nation by written authority? The convention was doubtless aware that to declare war was a natural right of sovereignty, and it did not mean to ignore or restrict that principle by conferring on one of the coordinate branches of the Government the power to do so, but its purpose was to designate what branch of the Government should have such power.

It is apparent, therefore, that this clause of the Constitution was adopted, not because there was inherently any want of power to prosecute a war, but because it was the belief of the Constitutional Convention that it should be vested in the legislative body and concurred in by the President. It is intended to prevent the President from exercising a power which might result disastrously to the Nation.

It has been contended that because the Constitutional Convention failed to confer upon the Congress the power to declare a state of peace or to end a war that this can only be done by the Executive, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, through the treaty-making power. I do not believe that such a conclusion is properly drawn from the action of the Constitutional Convention. Mr. Butler moved to add the words "and peace" after "war." It was defeated by a unanimous vote. Undoubtedly this motion was made in view of the provisions of the Articles of Confederation, which had been previously in existence. Article IX of the Articles of Confederation provides as follows:

ART. IX. The United States in Congress assembled, shall have the sole and exclusive right and power of determining on peace and war, except in the cases mentioned in the sixth article—of sending and receiving ambassadors—entering into treaties and alliances—

And so forth.

Under this provision it is well known that the Continental Congress prosecuted war, declared peace, and entered into treaties. The inefficient and cumbersome manner of conducting war entirely through a Congress was one of the principal reasons for conferring greater powers and making the Executive the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy.

On the proposition to confer upon the Congress the power to make peace, Mr. Ellsworth said:

There is a material difference between the cases of making war and making peace. It should be more easy to get out of war than into war. War is a simple and overt declaration. Peace is attended with intricate and secret negotiations.

It undoubtedly appeared to the members of the convention that it would not be wise to take from the President and the Senate the power to negotiate a treaty ending war. This was, according to the practice of nations, the usual and customary way of ending an international conflict. And to confer this power upon the Congress would exclude the treaty-making power, which undoubtedly is the most expeditious and satisfactory way of ending war.

The Constitution, therefore, contains no grant of power or limitations upon this question. It is not, in terms, conferred upon the President and the Senate, beyond the fact that it is undoubtedly included within the broad treaty-making power. In this grant of power, there is embodied no definition of the subjects within the treaty-making power. It may, therefore, be accepted that the people of the United States intended to confer upon the Federal Government no less power than was at the time exercised and enjoyed by other nations. There is nothing in the Constitution which would indicate that the Federal Government, acting through both the legislative and executive branches, could not, by a joint resolution or act of Congress, end hostilities. There is no universal practice among nations to end war only through treaties. In fact, all writers on international law state that there are three well-known ways of terminating war between belligerent States:

1. By a mere cessation of hostilities on both sides, without any definite understanding supervening.

The trouble with that in this case is that we have statutes continuing a state of war until they are repealed or a treaty is entered into.

2. By the conquest and subjugation of one of the contending parties by the other so that the former is reduced to impotence and submission.

That, of course, did not exist in this case.

3. By mutual agreement, embodied in a treaty of peace, whether the honors of war be equal or unequal.

There is nothing in the history of the Constitutional Convention to indicate that the United States did not have all of the sovereign powers in relation to ending hostilities which had been exercised by other nations.

Many instances exist of the termination of war by the cessation of hostilities without any treaty. For instance, in 1716, war between Charles XII, of Sweden, and Frederick Augustus, King of Poland, came to an end in this manner. In 1820 the war between Spain and France. In 1801 the Russian War with Persia. In 1810 the war between Spain and her revolted South American colonies. In 1820 the war whereby Venezuela acquired her independence. In 1861 the war between Prussia and the German States. In 1867 the war between France and Mexico.

PHILLIPS ON TERMINATION OF WAR AND TREATIES OF PEACE, CHAPTER I.

I believe it to be an incontrovertible proposition that the same power to declare war, raise and support an army and navy, make all rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces, appropriate money, and which, in fact, with the exception of the mere executive power of directing operations, is entire respecting war, may be exercised in ending war and declaring a state of peace. This power is inherent in every government unless there is some specific limitation in its constitution. It must be remembered that in the case of war with Germany, Congress simply declared a state of war to exist, and proceeded to enact all the laws necessary to prosecute it.

This same course was pursued in the case of the war between Mexico and the United States, where Congress simply passed a resolution to the effect that by the act of Mexico a state of war existed between that country and the United States.

Let me ask the Senate if Congress, having declared a state of war to exist between Germany and the United States, can not at any time repeal the declaration? If Congress should pass an act declaring war on a foreign country, would it not have power to repeal the act? Is it possible that Congress exhausts its power in the declaration of war and that war must continue until the President sees fit to negotiate a treaty and the Senate chooses to ratify it? If Congress should come to the conclusion that the recognition of a state of war was no longer advisable, it could withhold appropriations; it could repeal the legislation making rules and regulations for the conduct of the war; it could reduce the Army to a state which would render it impossible to further prosecute hostilities; and what it can do indirectly it must have power to do directly. This is one of the implied powers growing from the power to declare war and provide for its prosecution. It is inherent in every sovereign State. There are many implied powers exercised under the Constitution.

There is no provision in the Constitution for creating a national bank or any corporation. Yet it is settled by the great opinion of John Marshall in the case of McCullough v. State of Maryland (4 Wheat., 415) that this was one of the means which may be adopted by the Congress for carrying into execution the particular power. The Chief Justice said:

Among the enumerated powers we do not find that of establishing a bank or creating a corporation. But there is no phrase in the instrument which, like the Articles of Confederation, exclude incidental or implied powers and which requires that everything granted shall be expressly and minutely described. * * *

A constitution to contain an accurate detail of all the subdivisions of which its great powers will admit and of all the means by which they may be carried into execution would partake of the prolixity of a legal code and could scarcely be embraced by the human mind. (421–422.)

Again, there is no provision in the Constitution which expressly confers authority upon the United States to enlarge the national territorial domain, either by purchase, conquest, annexation, or treaty. And yet it is one of the implied powers, inherent in the very sovereignty of this country. Louisiana was thus obtained under the administration of Jefferson, Florida under Monroe, Texas during the Presidency of Tyler, and the territory acquired from Mexico was taken under Polk. Alaska was purchased from Russia. Porto Rico and the Philippine Islands were acquired by treaty as a result of war with Spain, and the Hawaiian Islands as a result of negotiations.

It is therefore settled beyond peradventure, without any express grant in the Constitution, that the Federal Government may acquire territory and Congress may make laws for the government of these territories, without being subject to all the restrictions imposed upon that body by the Constitution.

This was settled in the case of Dorr v. United States (195 U. S., 138), DeLima v. Bidwell (182 U. S., 1), and Downes v. Bidwell (182 U. S., 244).

In the Dorr case Mr. Justice Day said:

It may be regarded as settled that the Constitution of the United States is the only source of power authorizing action by any branch of the Federal Government. * * * It is equally well settled that the United States may acquire territory in the exercise of the treaty-making power by direct cession as a result of war and in making effectual the terms of peace, and for that purpose has the power of other sovereign nations.

There are many other instances which I could cite, but these sufficiently illustrate the implied powers inherent in the sovereign Government of the United States. There is no provision in the Constitution which designates how these powers shall be executed, whether the Government shall acquire territory by treaty, by conquest, or by subjugation of the people. It may, therefore, be accomplished by any of the means by which Governments may acquire additional territory.

Suppose some foreign government owning a territory contiguous to the United States was desirous of selling the same. Is it possible that Congress could not pass an act providing the terms on which the United States would purchase and make the necessary appropriations? Must there first be a treaty ratified by the Senate, and subsequently an act of Congress making the appropriations? The action of Congress would be necessary in either event.

Why should it be necessary, therefore, to observe the process of making a treaty and having it ratified by the Senate and then the Congress passing the necessary legislation to carry it into effect? It must be remembered that the treaty-making power is always subordinate to the power of Congress, for Congress can always denounce a treaty.

And while, of course, the Congress can not negotiate a treaty, it can, in my judgment, end a state of war which it has created; and if this is acquiesced in or agreed to by the foreign country, diplomatic relations may be restored and a state of peace will exist without the formal negotition and ratification of a treaty. The President, as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, may agree upon an armistice with the belligerent enemy and provide the terms and conditions of the same, but a state of war still exists and he has no power to restore a legal state of peace. He may negotiate a treaty, but the treaty has no validity until it is ratified by the Senate. And it seems to me incomprehensible that if the President, having no power to end war, should refuse to enter into a treaty, that a state of war must continue until the President is disposed to enter into negotiations.

It must be remembered that there is no express provision in the Constitution conferring the power on the President and the Senate to end war through the medium of a treaty or taking the power away from the Congress. The right of the President and the Senate to end war by a treaty is inferred from the general treaty-making power. If two branches of the Government concurring can declare a state of peace, it would seem as though all of the branches concurring might do the same, especially where the war power generally is conferred upon the Congress.

I might go further and say that if the treaty should be ratified to-morrow the Congress of the United States could annul it, denounce it, and refuse to make peace with Germany on the terms stated in the treaty.

There is one proposition enunciated by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] in his speech in the Senate during the last session and to some extent reiterated in his very able speech the other day with which I can not agree. It is his position that when the treaty was signed by England, France, Italy, and Japan, and ratified by those nations, it created a state of peace between this country and Germany. I can not see that where Congress created a state of war and it has been waged for more than a year and a half under the authority of Congress, any foreign countries have the power, by any treaty, to create a state of peace. Nor do I believe that the treaty is capable of any such construction.

The treaty, on page 15, is prefaced as follows:

> From the coming into force of the present treaty the state of war will terminate. From that moment and subject to the provisions of this treaty official relations with Germany, and with any of the German States, will be resumed by the allied and associated powers.

That means from the coming into force of the treaty between the United States and Germany, and that can only occur when the Senate ratifies it and the ratifications are properly exchanged, according to the terms of the treaty. The last clause of the treaty, page 537, provides as follows:

> A first procès verbal of the deposit of ratification will be drawn up as soon as the treaty has been ratified by Germany on the one hand and by three of the principal allied and associated powers on the other hand.
> From the date of this first procès verbal the treaty will come into force between the high contracting parties who have ratified it. For the determination of all periods of time provided for in the present treaty this date will be the date of the coming into force of the treaty.
> In all other respects the treaty will enter into force for each power at the date of the deposit of its ratification.

It will thus be seen that from the date of the first procès verbal the treaty will come into force only between the high contracting parties who have ratified it; that is, all the various terms and conditions apply alone to the belligerent nations thus completing the treaty.

Certainly no one will claim that until this country ratifies the treaty all its terms and provisions apply to the United States. But if it is true that this treaty has ended the war without our consent—ended our belligerent rights and imposed the rights of peace—if it has, as the Senator from Pennsylvania says, placed us in the same position we were in before the war, then I do not see why all the terms and provisions of the treaty do not apply to this country.

The President, in conjunction with foreign countries, had no power to impose a treaty upon this country or to end the war, except to end it in the sense of cessation of hostilities. The clause in this treaty which provides for the determination of all periods of time has nothing whatever to do with ending the war, so far as this country is concerned. It simply means what it says, that for the determination of all periods of time provided for in the treaty the date of the ratification by Germany and three of the allied powers shall be known as the date of coming into force of the treaty. But it is provided that in all other respects, except the fixing of this date, the treaty comes into force as between the contracting nations when it is ratified.

Now, what is this date which it is important to fix by the first procès verbal? It is simply the date from which the time runs within which certain acts are to be performed by Germany, or those allied powers who have signed and ratified the treaty. Let us see what those are. For instance, section 7, article 83, of the treaty provides that a commission of seven members, five nominated by the principal allied powers, one by Poland, and one by the Czecho-Slovak State, will be appointed 15 days after the coming into force of the present treaty, to trace on the spot the frontier line between Poland and the Czecho-Slovak State. Similar provisions are made as to Poland and other countries.

Various of these dates are recited by the Senator in his speech; for instance, Germany is to demobilize and to reduce her military forces, armament, and so forth, to specified limits within two months from the coming into force of the treaty. Within three months certain war material manufactories are to be closed down. Fortifications are to be dismantled. All of these dates were not, of course, postponed until the last nation should ratify, and all that the treaty provides for is that where this language is used throughout the treaty, the time begins to run from the first procès verbal, which is to be issued when Germany and three of the principal allied powers have ratified the treaty. But there is not a word in the treaty to indicate that as between the United States and Germany war is legally ended, and all our rights as a belligerent are suspended. For instance, many of the laws we have passed continue during the war. If the position of the Senator is correct, the moment the first procès verbal is published, we cease to have the right to treat German nationals as alien enemies.

It seems to me, therefore, Mr. President, that either a treaty or an act of Congress is now necessary to end a state of war and place this country upon a basis where we may renew our diplomatic, consular, and trade relations with the Central Empires.

The Senator from Nebraska has threatened that the President will veto this resolution. I doubt not that he will, and I realize that he has the full power of appointment of diplomatic and consular officers; that he may nullify the resolution, if he wishes, as he has nullified the acts and the will of the majority of the Senate and the voice of the American people upon the treaty, but that responsibility rests upon him.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, on page 5 of the substitute amendment reported by the committee I propose to strike out the words:

> To these ends, and for the purpose of establishing fully friendly relations and commercial intercourse between the United States and Germany, the President is hereby requested immediately to open negotiations with the Government of Germany.

Of course, the President has the power absolutely at any time to open negotiations, and it is equally proper for the Senate to request him to do so; it has been done many times in our history, but it seems to me needless to request him to do so in this resolution. I think the language is rather surplusage, and I therefore ask that those words be stricken out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STERLING in the chair). The amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts to the amendment reported by the committee will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 5 of the proposed amendment of the Committee on Foreign Relations, beginning with the last word in line 20, it is proposed to strike out the remainder of the section, as follows:

> To these ends, and for the purpose of establishing fully friendly relations and commercial intercourse between the United States and Germany, the President is hereby requested immediately to open negotiations with the Government of Germany.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KING. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Glass	Lodge	Sheppard
Ball	Hale	McKellar	Shields
Borah	Harding	McNary	Smith, Ariz.
Brandegee	Harris	Moses	Smith, Md.
Calder	Henderson	Norris	Smoot
Capper	Johnson, Calif.	Nugent	Spencer
Chamberlain	Jones, N. Mex.	Overman	Sterling
Colt	Jones, Wash.	Owen	Swanson
Curtis	Kellogg	Page	Townsend
Dial	Kendrick	Phelan	Trammell
Edge	Kenyon	Phipps	Underwood
Elkins	Keyes	Pittman	Wadsworth
Fernald	King	Ransdell	Walsh, Mass.
France	Knox	Reed	Walsh, Mont.
Gay	Lenroot	Robinson	Warren

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I am very anxious to reach a vote on the pending joint resolution, but I have made inquiries in all directions and I find scarcely any Senators who manifest a desire to speak upon it. I do not want to have the resolution put aside for other matters which may come in; I think we ought either to vote or speak; that we should not put it over from day to day, having but one speech a day. We ought to dispose of the joint resolution; and, if we are unable to come to an agreement as to a time to vote, I think we should stay here and either discuss the joint resolution or vote upon it. I wish to ask the opinion of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] as to whether he would not think it advisable, perhaps, to agree upon a time when a vote should be taken, giving to Senators who desire to speak—and I know there are very few, if any—an opportunity so to do.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Massachusetts that there is not a great deal of disposition, so far as I know, on this side of the Chamber to discuss the resolution. I think there are probably one or two speeches that will be made upon it. I think the Senator from Massachusetts is entirely right in his proposition that we ought to do one of two things—either vote when there ceases to be any desire to speak or fix a definite time for a vote. I know that one of the members of the Committee on Foreign Relations on this side of the Chamber, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], has expressed a desire to speak. He was called away from the city. I thought he would be back here to-day, but he has not returned. I am sure, however, that he will be back to-morrow. Therefore, if agreeable to the Senator from Massachusetts, I suggest that we fix the hour of 4 o'clock to-morrow for a vote, and in the meantime, if any Senators desire to speak on the joint resolution, that they be given the right of way in preference to any other business.

Mr. LODGE. I should be very glad to make an arrangement to vote on the joint resolution at that time, but there are two Senators who are obliged to be away to-morrow who will be here on Saturday.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have no objection to fixing a definite time on Saturday for the vote, with the understanding that we may take up other business if the time is not filled and that the Senator who desires to speak on this question shall have the right of way.

Mr. LODGE. Very well. Then I ask unanimous consent that at 3 o'clock on Saturday next, without further debate, a vote be taken on the resolution and all amendments pending or hereafter offered. I will request the Secretary to put the request in the usual form.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Do I understand that the hour is fixed for 3 o'clock on Saturday afternoon next?

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The request for unanimous consent will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] asks unanimous consent that at not later than 3 o'clock p. m. on the calendar day of Saturday, May 15, 1920, the Senate will proceed to vote, without further debate, upon any amendment that may be pending, any amendment that may be offered, and upon the resolution H. J. Res. 327, a resolution terminating the state of war declared to exist April 6, 1917, between the Imperial German Government and the United States, and so forth, through the regular parliamentary stages to its final disposition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. REED. I suggest 4 o'clock, because we do not meet until 12 o'clock, and frequently the morning hour consumes part of the time. Four o'clock would give us at least a couple of hours for debate on that day, if any Senator desires to speak.

Mr. LODGE. Very well, let 4 o'clock be fixed as the hour.

Mr. REED. That will be satisfactory to me.

Mr. LODGE. That will be satisfactory to me.

Mr. REED. I am ready to go on now, if the Senator desires.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The hour now proposed to be fixed is agreeable to me.

Mr. LODGE. Very well. I will ask that the hour be fixed at 4 o'clock p. m.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. It is proposed to change the hour, so as to make it not later than 4 o'clock p. m. on the calendar day of Saturday, May 15.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NUGENT in the chair). Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Massachusetts as modified. The Chair hears no objection, and the agreement is entered into.

The unanimous-consent agreement is as follows:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that at not later than 4 o'clock p. m. on the calendar day of Saturday, May 15, 1920, the Senate will proceed to vote, without further debate, upon any amendment that may be pending, any amendment that may be offered, and upon the resolution (H. J. Res. 327) terminating the state of war declared to exist April 6, 1917, between the Imperial German Government and the United States, permitting, on conditions, the resumption of reciprocal trade with Germany, and for other purposes, through the regular parliamentary stages to its final disposition.

SIERRA NATIONAL FOREST.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2789) for the consolidation of forest lands in the Sierra National Forest, Calif., and for other purposes.

Mr. PHELAN. I move that the Senate disagree to the amendments of the House and request a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. SMOOT, Mr. FALL, and Mr. PHELAN conferees on the part of the Senate.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H. R. 10183. An act to authorize aids to navigation and for other works in the Lighthouse Service, and for other purposes; and

H. R. 10328. An act to amend sections 1 and 4 of an act approved May 18, 1916, entitled "An act to provide for the removal of what is known as the Aqueduct Bridge, across the Potomac River, and for the building of a bridge in the place thereof."

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were each read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on Commerce:

H. R. 10183. An act to authorize aids to navigation and for other works in the Lighthouse Service, and for other purposes; and

H. R. 10328. An act to amend sections 1 and 4 of an act approved May 18, 1916, entitled "An act to provide for the removal of what is known as the Aqueduct Bridge, across the Potomac River, and for the building of a bridge in the place thereof."

FORTIFICATIONS APPROPRIATIONS—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. SMOOT submitted the following conference report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13555) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, and for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 1, 2, 3, 5, 6, and 12.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 4, 7, 8, 9, 10, and 11, and agree to the same.

REED SMOOT,
W. S. KENYON,
LEE S. OVERMAN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

C. B. SLEMP,
BURTON L. FRENCH,
JOHN J. EAGAN,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. SMOOT. I may state that it is a complete agreement between the two Houses.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. As the Senate does not require by its rules a statement of a conference report, as the House does, I ask the Senator from Utah to give a statement as to the effect of it.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in answer to the request made by the Senator from Alabama, I will make an explanation of the report.

On page 5 of the bill, the House appropriated for purchase, maintenance, and test of ammunition for mountain, field, and siege cannon, $1,600,000. The Senate increased that appropriation to $2,000,000, and the Senate receded.

On page 6, the House made an appropriation of $350,000 for proving grounds. That was increased by the Senate to $500,000. The Senate receded from that, and the appropriation is for $350,000.

On page 8, for land defenses in the Hawaiian Islands, the House appropriated $130,000, and upon the basis of a letter received from the Secretary of War the Senate increased that amount to $560,000; but upon the showing made by the House, the Senate receded from that increase.

On the same page, the Senate struck out "Philippine" and inserted "Hawaiian," and it was done at the request of the department; and the House receded from that amendment.

On page 11, in the Air Service, the Senate inserted a proviso that the unexpended balances of the appropriations made for aviation purposes in connection with the sea-coast defenses in the insular possessions in the act approved February 14, 1917, should be made available until June 30, 1921. The Senate receded.

The next amendment was on page 14, where the Senate inserted a provision that the unexpended balance of the sum of $155,000 appropriated by the act of July 8, 1918, for the purchase or reclamation of land required for the defense of the Panama Canal should be made available until June 30, 1921. The Senate receded.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to ask him a question upon that subject? I supposed an appropriation for that purpose had been carried in the bill in the last Congress. Is that supplemental of the appropriation of two years ago?

Mr. SMOOT. This appropriation was made first in the act of July 8, 1919, to be expended up to and including June 30, 1920. No decision has been made yet as to whether or not they are going to expend it, and the House presented to the conferees a statement that convinced the Senate conferees that if an appropriation was really necessary at any time in the future the appropriation could be regularly made.

On page 16 the Senate inserted the words "or contracts," so that it would read:

That all orders or contracts for the manufacture of material.

And the House agreed to that amendment.

In section 7, where the unexpended balances are turned into the Treasury of the United States, the Senate turned back, for supplies for seacoast defenses, $40,000, and the House agreed to the Senate amendment.

Also, the Senate increased the amount to be turned into the Treasury for sites for fortifications and coast defenses from $63,346.68 to $88,292.88, and the House agreed. I will say to the Senator that that increase was made upon the recommendation of the War Department.

In the case of submarine-mine structures the Senate inserted $15,200 to be turned back into the Treasury, and the House agreed.

The total, of course, was changed, and the House agreed to the additional amount that was to be turned back into the Treasury.

Section 9 was inserted by the Senate, reading as follows:

That no part of the moneys appropriated in this or any previous act shall be expended to abolish or remove from any one of the arsenals of the United States any permanent department or shop established by legislative act prior to April 6, 1917, unless such removal is authorized by act of Congress.

The Senate yielded to the House on that amendment.

Those are all the changes that were made in conference.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator about the reduction of the appropriation for seacoast defenses. Does that include stopping the contracts on the great guns that were provided for two years ago?

Mr. SMOOT. No; this is an unexpended balance that Gen. Lord reported to the committee that they had no contracts to cover, and he stated that they could turn this amount of money in the former appropriation back into the Treasury of the United States without interfering at all with the work.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It does not interfere with the plans that were agreed on two years ago?

Mr. SMOOT. Not at all.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am not in favor of any very great military expenditures at this time, but I think, so far as our seacoast defenses are concerned, the work that has already been begun should not be stopped.

Mr. SMOOT. This will not stop it in any way, and I will say to the Senator again that this was done upon the recommendation of the War Department.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

REPUBLIC OF ARMENIA.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate take up for immediate consideration Senate resolution 359.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. OVERMAN. Will the Senator from Ohio let us know what the resolution proposes?

Mr. HARDING. Perhaps I ought to state that this is a unanimous report of the Foreign Relations Committee with reference to Armenia. I do not think it will take three minutes to pass it.

Mr. OVERMAN. I have no objection.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution (S. Res. 359) reported by Mr. HARDING from the Committee on Foreign Relations on the 11th instant, and it was read, as follows:

Whereas the testimony adduced at the hearings conducted by the subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations have clearly established the truth of the reported massacres and other atrocities from which the Armenian people have suffered; and

Whereas the people of the United States are deeply impressed by the deplorable conditions of insecurity, starvation, and misery now prevalent in Armenia; and

Whereas the independence of the Republic of Armenia has been duly recognized by the supreme council of the peace conference and by the Government of the United States of America: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the sincere congratulations of the Senate of the United States are hereby extended to the people of Armenia on the recognition of the independence of the Republic of Armenia, without prejudice respecting the territorial boundaries involved; and be it further

Resolved, That the Senate of the United States hereby expresses the hope that stable government, proper protection of individual liberties and rights, and the full realization of nationalistic aspirations may soon be attained by the Armenian people; and be it further

Resolved, That in order to afford necessary protection for the lives and property of citizens of the United States at the port of Batum and along the line of the railroad leading to Baku, the President is hereby requested, if not incompatible with the public interest, to cause a United States warship and a force of marines to be dispatched to such port with instructions to such marines to disembark and to protect American lives and property.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, for the benefit of the few Senators who are present on the floor I will state that this resolution is the outcome of rather extended hearings on the part of a subcommittee, which made very careful inquiry into the Armenian situation and took note of the propositions that had been made relative to the American occupation of the new Republic with an armed force and the various angles of the political situation internationally. It was thought that the United States was going as far as it reasonably could to express its felicitations on the recognition of a new Republic there, and then for the relief of those peoples to ask the President to send a warship with marines to the port of Batum, ostensibly for the protection of American lives and property in that port and along the railway to the port of Baku. The real object, however, of the landing of marines is to guarantee the maintenance of a communication line through the port of Batum to Erivan.

To the everlasting credit of America let it be said that out of the generosity of the American purse we have been contributing for 30 months a million dollars per month to save that unfortunate people from starvation. If through any unfortunate conflict over there there should be an impairment of the transportation service, we would be helpless to continue the helpful part we are playing in saving that unfortunate people. More than that, if the President sees fit to accept this suggestion and we send a body of marines on the mainland of northern Armenia, it will add very materially to the morale of their own armed forces.

I think we can do nothing less than pass this resolution of interest and felicitation on the part of the Senate, with this request to the President to recognize the needs of the situation over there. I think the Senate ought to pass the resolution without the slightest hesitation. It is the unanimous report of the Foreign Relations Committee.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, as I understand, this resolution is entirely advisory.

Mr. HARDING. Wholly so.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It does not remove the discretion of the President, who is the power that should act in this matter; and as it is merely expressing the wish of the Senate, I have no objection to it.

Mr. HARDING. The Senator from Alabama will note that in the second section of the resolution the President is requested, if not incompatible with the public interest, to cause a United States warship and a force of marines to be sent to Batum. It is wholly advisory.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have no doubt in the world that the resolution is entirely for a good purpose, and one with which we are all in sympathy, and I see no objection to it. I think there is, on general principles, an old-time objection to the Executive invading the jurisdiction of the legislative branch, and the legislative branch attempting to invade the jurisdiction of the President. Under these circumstances, however, I think it is entirely helpful and not harmful to advise the President of the sentiment of the Senate in reference to this matter, and I do not think it goes further than that.

Mr. HARDING. If the Senator from Alabama will not misconstrue the remark, I venture to say that the invasion is not out of harmony with practices of recent date.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am sure that there has been invasion in many ways on both sides of the line, but I do not think one department of the Government dipping into the business of another department of the Government is helpful in the interests of good business and good government.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I may say, if the Senator from Ohio will allow me, in order to reassure the Senator from Alabama, that the adoption of this resolution is particularly desired by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], who was on the subcommittee and helped to prepare it; and I think that ought to be a guaranty of its good character.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think so, too.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

The preamble was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore announced his signature to the enrolled bill (S. 795) to provide for the disposition of public lands withdrawn and improved under the provisions of the reclamation laws, and which are no longer needed in connection with said laws, which had previously been signed by the Speaker of the House.

LANDS IN WYOMING.

Mr. KENDRICK, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 13157) authorizing the issuance of patent to Johnson County, Wyo., of lands for poor-farm purposes, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 586) thereon.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED.

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. CUMMINS:

A bill (S. 4374) granting an increase of pension to James H. Hargis; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. OWEN:

A bill (S. 4375) for the relief of the Pawnee Tribe of Indians of Oklahoma; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. HARRISON:

A bill (S. 4376) providing for the distribution of photographs of cemeteries in Europe in which American soldiers, sailors, and marines are buried to the next of kin of such persons; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. GRONNA:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 196) extending the provisions of an act amending section 32 of the Federal farm-loan act approved July 17, 1916, to June 30, 1921; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

RAILROAD INDEBTEDNESS.

Mr. CUMMINS. By direction of the Committee on Interstate Commerce I introduce a bill to amend sections 207 and 210 of the transportation act 1920.

The bill (S. 4373) to amend sections 207 and 210 of the transportation act 1920 was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. CUMMINS. On behalf of the Committee on Interstate Commerce I now report back the bill favorably and ask that it go to the calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CURTIS in the chair). The bill will be placed on the calendar.

AMENDMENTS TO SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CUMMINS. By direction of the same committee I submit the following amendment to the sundry civil appropriation bill and ask that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations and printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN submitted an amendment proposing to increase the appropriation to be paid the Sanitarium Co. of Portland, Oreg., for the care and maintenance of Alaskan insane patients during the fiscal year 1921 from $520 per capita to $540 per capita, intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. KENDRICK submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $25,000 for an investigation and survey for an irrigation system in the Green River watershed, Wyoming, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $150,000 for the Riverton project, Wyoming, intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $469,000 for the Shoshone project, Wyoming, intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. FERNALD submitted an amendment relative to the payment of contracts under the act of August 25, 1919, for the construction, improvement, special repair, equipment, and furnishing of post offices and other public buildings, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

FUEL FOR GOVERNMENT SHIPS.

Mr. CUMMINS submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 361), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Whereas it is generally known that the available supply of oil for fuel is rapidly diminishing, and that the time may speedily come when our Army transports, naval, and merchant vessels will be compelled to depend upon coal to furnish their motive power; and

Whereas when that time comes the coal fields yielding the quality of coal required for economic and efficient use on ships, and reasonably proximate to the various ports of the United States, may either be exhausted or greatly advanced in value; and

Whereas a survey of the situation, in view of these recognized facts, seems to be desirable: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs of the Senate be directed to enter upon an investigation of the subject, and as soon as possible report to the Senate its recommendations respecting the following inquiries:

1. Is it probable that our Army transports, naval, and merchant vessels now equipped, or hereafter to be equipped, for the use of oil as fuel will be compelled again to use coal as fuel?

2. Where are the coal fields from which coal of the proper quality for use on ships can be mined situated?

3. What is the transportation cost of moving the coal from these fields to the various ports of the United States?

4. Would it be good policy for the Government to acquire such of these coal fields as may be necessary to furnish the supply that will be needed for Government ships and our merchant marine, and if so, what would be the probable cost of acquiring them at this time, assuming that it is desirable that the country shall be assured of an adequate supply of coal, for these purposes, for a reasonable period?

Resolved further, That the Committee on Naval Affairs, or any subcommittee thereof, be authorized and directed to subpœna witnesses and compel their attendance, to send for persons and papers, and do such further acts as may be necessary to secure any and all information desired in the furtherance of said inquiry.

Resolved further, That the expense of the aforesaid inquiry be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

INDEPENDENCE OF EGYPT.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I offer the following resolution, which I would like to call to the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]:

Whereas in a diplomatic communication from the foreign office of Great Britain to the United States State Department of December 18, 1914, this Government was advised that, because of the war initiated by Turkey against Egypt, the suzerainty of Turkey over Egypt was terminated and Egypt placed under the protection of Great Britain "for the safety of the inhabitants, the defense of the country, and the protection of the many and various important interests existing there"; and

Whereas in a proclamation issued by His Majesty, King George V, dated December 18, 1914, it was stated that Great Britain had assumed this responsibility "to successfully overcome all the influences which are seeking to destroy the independence of Egypt," etc.; and

Whereas the Secretary of State, in an official communication of December 16, 1919, to a member of this body, stated: "It is assumed that it is the purpose of Great Britain to carry out the assurances given by King George V of England," hereinabove referred to: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate, That the Secretary of State be requested to advise the Senate whether or not the pending treaty between the allied Governments and Turkey contains any provision which might properly be interpreted to the contrary to the understanding of the Senate with respect to the so-called protectorate of Great Britain over Egypt having been merely a war measure to preserve the integrity and independence of Egypt during the war.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator ask that the resolution go to the Committee on Foreign Relations?

Mr. OWEN. I would like to have it either go to the committee or to be acted upon now. It is a resolution asking for information. I wanted to call the attention of the chairman of the committee to it. If he desires to have it go to the committee, I will be happy to have it referred.

Mr. LODGE. It is certainly an important matter, and I think it should go to the committee. There is rather a thin Senate here.

Mr. OWEN. Yes; that, of course, is true.

Mr. LODGE. I think perhaps it would be better to have it referred to the committee.

Mr. OWEN. Then I ask that it be referred to the committee.

The resolution (S. Res. 360) was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

TERMINATION OF WAR WITH GERMANY.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 327) terminating the state of war declared to exist April 6, 1917, between the Imperial German Government and the United States, permitting on conditions the resumption of reciprocal trade with Germany, and for other purposes.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LENROOT. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KING. As the Senator intends to discuss the peace resolution, now before the Senate, and as that is quite important, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum is suggested. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ball	Glass	McCumber	Smith, Ariz.
Brandegee	Hale	McNary	Smith, S. C.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-five Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, yesterday during the speech of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], wherein he undertook to argue that Congress had no right to declare a termination of the war, I asked him if it was not true that the termination of the Civil War was declared by Congress, and that it was the action of Congress, and not that of the President, which was recognized by the Supreme Court as being the action that was binding upon the courts of the country.

Later on the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] undertook to show that this statement of mine was not accurate; that it was really the proclamation of the President announcing the suppression of the rebellion which was the final act that brought about a peace status after the Civil War.

I was familiar at the time with the decisions. The Senator from Colorado read from the decision in the case of the United States against Anderson, in Ninth Wallace, but he read only the recitals concerning the facts, stating that upon the 20th day of August, 1866, the President made a proclamation announcing that the rebellion had been suppressed, and that later on Congress had recognized that in certain statutes. But the Senator from Colorado, if he had just gone down about one-half page further, would have found very clearly that it was the action of Congress and not of the President that determined the peace status, or the declaration of the termination of the war, for the court said:

> As Congress, in its legislation for the Army, has determined—
> Not the President—
> As Congress, in its legislation for the Army, has determined that the rebellion closed on the 20th day of August, 1866, there is no reason why its declaration on this subject should not be received as settling the question wherever private rights are affected by it. That day will therefore be accepted as the day when the rebellion was suppressed, as respects the rights intended to be secured by the captured and abandoned property act.

So there can be no question but that it was the action of Congress which was recognized by the Supreme Court as being the final authority in declaring the termination of that war and not the action of the President of the United States by way of proclamation.

Much has been said by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and others concerning the effort made in the Constitutional Convention to give to the Congress the power not only to declare war but to make peace, and, of course, they have stated the historical facts correctly. But, Mr. President, it does not seem to have occurred to these gentlemen that if that power had been granted to Congress it would have been exclusive, just as the power to declare war is exclusive in Congress; there could not have been peace under the treaty-making power, the joint action of the President and the Senate. So it does not exclude the idea in any way that peace may not be secured by some other means than the treaty-making power, nor does it signify that the President, under the Constitution, can keep this country in a state of war so long as he may hold his office, irrespective of the will of Congress or of the people of the United States.

I frankly admit, of course, that Congress can not by statute make a negotiated peace. I admit that Congress can not, by this joint resolution or by statute, affect our international diplomatic relations. Congress can not by statute make a contract with a foreign power. But Congress has the right to declare the existence of a fact, and Congress has the right to go to the fullest extent with reference to legislation—war legislation, if you choose—even to the point of repealing a declaration of war, in so far as private rights are concerned.

For a good many years it was denied in the courts of the country that Congress had any right either to repeal or modify a treaty of the United States with a foreign power made by the treaty-making power. Of course, it is now well settled that the Senate and the President can make a treaty to-day and Congress may repeal it or modify it to-morrow. The leading case upon that subject, as lawyers well know, is the Head Money cases, where this question was very fully discussed in One hundred and twelfth United States. The court used this language:

> A treaty is made by the President and the Senate. Statutes are made by the President, the Senate, and the House of Representatives. The addition of the latter body to the other two in making a law certainly does not render it less entitled to respect in the matter of its repeal or modification than a treaty made by the other two. If there be any difference in this regard, it would seem to be in favor of an act in which all three of the bodies participate. And such is, in fact, the case in a declaration of war, which must be made by Congress, and which, when made, usually suspends or destroys existing treaties between the nations thus at war. In short, we are of opinion that so far as a treaty made by the United States with any foreign power can become a subject of judicial cognizance in the courts of this country, it is subject to such acts as Congress may pass for its enforcement, modification, or repeal.

That, of course, is the settled doctrine of the courts, and, of course, that doctrine must apply to the case before us. We can not by the passage of the joint resolution bring about a state of peace with Germany. If the joint resolution shall pass and become a law and Germany thereafter shall take like action, declaring upon its part a termination of the war with the United States, then both nations will be at peace for all purposes and just as effectively, so far as a peace status is concerned, as if there had been a negotiated treaty ratified by both powers. I do not think there can be any question about that.

But if Germany does not do that, I admit that an American citizen over in Germany will not have a peace status by the passage of this joint resolution. It will require further action, either by Germany or by a negotiated treaty which I expect will follow even though this resolution shall become a law. But it clearly does restore a peace status so far as the United States is concerned; and there can not, it seems to me, be any question of the power of Congress to do that very thing.

It is said that the same object could be accomplished by a repeal of all the war powers that have been vested in the President. That is true only in part. It is true that Congress can repeal all the legislation vesting war powers in the President of the United States, but even if that were done, I take it for granted that the President, as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, would still have, while we were under a state of war, very vast powers that he could exercise which did not require any legislation upon the part of Congress.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KEYES in the chair). Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. LENROOT. With pleasure.

Mr. KNOX. Does not the Senator believe that Germany, by signing the treaty at Versailles, which contained a provision that that treaty should go into effect and that peace should exist upon the deposit of the ratifications by Germany and three of the allied and associated powers, has created a status of peace as between Germany and all the rest of the nations?

Mr. LENROOT. I would hardly be prepared to concede that, although I think it is a debatable question. The language is:

> From the date of this first procès verbal the treaty will come into force between the high contracting parties who have ratified it.

Mr. KNOX. The Senator does not mind if I take a moment of his time?

Mr. LENROOT. No; I am very glad to have the Senator do so.

Mr. KNOX. There are always two functions in a treaty of peace. One is to declare the fact of peace and the other is to determine the conditions upon which the peace shall exist.

I take it that the President of the United States, by executive act, can determine the fact of peace, in conjunction with those with whom we were associated in the war, and that the signatures to the treaty of Versailles, agreeing to the fact that peace would be established upon the deposit of the ratifications of Germany and three other powers, determined the fact of peace. As to all other matters—that is, as to the conditions upon which we are to live with Germany or other countries are to live with Germany—that depends upon each country's ratification of the treaty.

Mr. LENROOT. I should like to ask the Senator this question, because I, of course, have very high opinion of his judgment: The United States not having ratified the treaty, the United States still having its own soldiers upon German soil, might not Germany still be able to claim that so long as we had taken no action, either through ratification of the treaty or by such action as we here and now propose, and still maintained American soldiers upon German soil, that they would have the right to regard that as an evidence that we still regarded ourselves at war with Germany?

Mr. KNOX. I think not, for this reason: Our troops are maintained upon German soil by reason of the terms of the armistice, and the armistice was the thing which the President, as the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, undoubtedly had a right to agree to. The President did not ratify the armistice. The Senate did not ratify the armistice. The armistice was a military act which was performed by Gen. Foch. The President of the United States had nothing to do with it except to acquiesce in it. It was one of the terms of that armistice that certain soldiers were to remain upon German soil until certain conditions had been complied with.

Mr. LENROOT. Does not that bring us to this very point: If our soldiers are there to-day under the terms of the armistice, then it negatives the idea which the Senator has just suggested, that there is a complete peace under the treaty as a fact?

Mr. KNOX. That depends altogether on the nature of the armistice. As I tried to argue here the other day, it was only by courtesy called an armistice. It was in fact a capitulation on the part of Germany.

Mr. LENROOT. That would depend upon its own terms and not upon the terms of the peace treaty.

Mr. KNOX. Absolutely.

Mr. LENROOT. I agree with the Senator upon that. The point I was making was that without the passage of this resolution, with our continuing technically in a state of war, without any further legislation the President might, if he saw fit, transport 100,000 American soldiers to German soil to-morrow, and he might declare the armistice at an end. The President, irrespective of anything Congress might do, except as to withholding its appropriations, might renew the war with Germany to-morrow.

Mr. KNOX. Not unless he would violate the terms of the armistice.

Mr. LENROOT. I say, of course, it provides by its own terms for its expiration, and it does not now continue indefinitely. I do not know just how it is continued, but I assume it is not for an indefinite period even under the terms of the armistice. Am I correct in that?

Mr. KNOX. The terms of the armistice terminated the war. Of course the war being terminated, any act of hostility by the United States would be in violation of the terms of the armistice, because that was the purpose of the armistice.

Mr. LENROOT. The armistice only existed for a given length of time, and then that was extended from time to time until it ripened into a peace treaty.

Mr. KNOX. It continued until the purpose of the armistice had been effected, namely, a complete suspension of hostilities, the dismemberment of Germany, so far as you can speak of it from a military sense, the surrender of her guns, her ships, her airplanes, and everything else that put her absolutely out of the possibility of continuing hostilities, just as the President proclaimed to us in a joint session of Congress that we had now reached the point where it was impossible for Germany to renew hostilities.

Mr. LENROOT. I would agree with that provided the Senator will agree that the present state of peace is determined by the existence of the fact of a cessation of hostilities and not by an agreement in the armistice, because if we are depending upon the armistice for our right to continue soldiers over there, the armistice must be regarded as having the ordinary meaning of an armistice, it seems to me. It may be terminated, unless it is fixed for a definite time, at the will of either party.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, I do not wish to annoy the Senator by interrupting him too frequently——

Mr. LENROOT. It is no annoyance at all, I assure the Senator.

Mr. KNOX. The maintenance of our troops or the French troops or English troops in Germany was only to see that the terms of the armistice were carried out. The terms of the armistice, as I say, completely disabled Germany from any longer carrying on the war.

Mr. LENROOT. That is true.

Mr. KNOX. And it was, in effect, an absolute capitulation or surrender of the German Army and of German munitions of war. I can not see, the effect of the armistice having been to terminate the war, why it is not perfectly proper to say, when that is followed by a treaty of peace which says that the actual period of peace shall begin from the time of the deposit of those ratifications, that Germany, at least internationally, is not at peace with all the world. I concede that domestically we are still at war, and that is the reason for this resolution, in order to terminate that status.

Mr. COLT. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly.

Mr. COLT. Looking at the question from the standpoint of Germany first, does not the Senator think that when Germany signed the peace treaty, and three of the allied and associated powers ratified it, Germany put herself in the condition of declaring a termination of the war as to all the belligerents, so far as Germany was concerned, the treaty itself expressly declaring that "from the coming into force of the present treaty the state of war will terminate"?

Assuming the truth of this proposition, does it not logically follow that if Germany has thus terminated the war on her part then all that remains for the United States to do is to end the war, so far as we are concerned, by the repeal of the act declaring war?

Of course the Senator from Pennsylvania does not mean to say that upon the signing of the armistice the war had terminated. This was only the initial step in his argument that the war was, in fact, terminated upon the signing of the treaty.

I want to look at the position of Germany to-day, so far as the termination of the war is concerned, and if I find that Germany for herself has terminated the war by her own acts, then all the United States has to do is to terminate the war on our part by repealing the act declaring war or by some public proclamation.

Mr. KNOX. If the Senator's question is addressed to me—and I am not quite sure whether it is or not—I take this opportunity of saying that he has exactly stated my position.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I think we will all agree, whatever may have been the effect either of Germany's agreeing to the armistice or Germany's agreeing to the treaty of Versailles, that as a matter of fact war has terminated, there having been no hostilities since November 11, 1918; and we will agree, I think, that, so far as private rights in Germany are concerned, if that did not amount to a declaration of the termination of the war upon her part, a declaration made now similar to that which it is here proposed that the United States shall make will accomplish the full purpose; so that if both the United States and Germany have made like declarations concerning the termination of the war, then both countries become at peace when that has been done.

Mr. COLT. May I suggest to the Senator—because he is reasoning about this matter very carefully—that I am dealing with the proposition of a legal termination of the war. In all cases where there has been merely a cessation of hostilities for a long period of time this condition results simply in a de facto peace or a presumption of peace. What we want is to get into an actual condition of legal peace; and if Germany by her act in signing the treaty and what followed has legally terminated the war so far as she is concerned, all we have got to do is to terminate it for ourselves in a legal manner by repealing our declaration of war or by a public proclamation.

Mr. LENROOT. I agree to that, and I would simply go one step further and say that if Germany has not legally terminated the war, so far as she is concerned, she may still do so by taking the same action that is now proposed to be taken here.

Mr. President, we have precedents for this kind of legislation. Legislation enacted under the Taft administration in the matter of the Canadian reciprocity was exactly of this character. In that instance we enacted certain legislation, to become effective when the Dominion of Canada should enact like legislation. It was not a treaty, but each nation legislated for itself. The legislation, however, was to become effective only when there was reciprocal legislation by the other party. That, however, is involved in the House resolution, but not in the substitute resolution that is before us.

Mr. KNOX. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. LENROOT. I yield.

Mr. KNOX. That was really a treaty, and one of the terms of the treaty was that it was not to be effective until it was ratified by the legislative branches of the two Governments. I happen to know about that treaty, as I myself negotiated it.

Mr. LENROOT. Was there a prior treaty with reference to the reciprocity legislation?

Mr. KNOX. We negotiated a treaty with Canada, and I think we agreed that the duties should be thus and so; and one of the clauses of the treaty was that it was not to be effective until it had been approved by the legislative branches of both Governments. That was written into the treaty.

Mr. LENROOT. Is it possible that I am mistaken? I can not be mistaken about that.

Mr. McCUMBER. Was that treaty adopted by the Senate?

Mr. KNOX. That treaty was adopted by the Senate and by the House.

Mr. LENROOT. I think the Senator from Pennsylvania is mistaken.

Mr. McCUMBER. It was adopted by legislation.

Mr. KNOX. It was adopted by legislation.

Mr. McCUMBER. It was never adopted as a treaty.

Mr. LENROOT. It was not in the form of a treaty.

Mr. KNOX. It was in the form of a treaty, and one of the conditions of the treaty was that instead of being approved by two-thirds of the Senate of the United States it should be approved by the Parliament of Canada and the Congress of the United States.

Mr. LENROOT. It was, in fact, a legislative act; it was not enacted under the treaty-making power of Congress at all, but under the power of reciprocal legislation.

Mr. KNOX. It was negotiated through the regular diplomatic channels. Mr. Fielding, the minister of finance, and Mr. Patterson, the minister of agriculture, were appointed representatives of the Canadian Government, and I acted on the part of the Government of the United States.

Mr. LENROOT. But it was never ratified by the Senate.

Mr. KNOX. No; I say it was not put through as a treaty.

Mr. LENROOT. That is the point.

Mr. KNOX. It was a contract between two Governments, to be effective only when the legislative branches of those Governments affirmed it.

Mr. LENROOT. It could not have been a valid contract unless it was ratified by the Senate under the treaty-making power.

Mr. KNOX. It is not a question of what it could be; that is what is was.

Mr. LENROOT. That may be so; in other words, it was a gentlemen's agreement that a certain thing should be done in a particular way.

Mr. KNOX. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. Which, as a matter of fact—and I took quite an active part in the discussion in the other House—was by way of legislation.

But, Mr. President, I do not think there can be any possible doubt concerning the power of Congress to take the action that is here proposed. Where do the opponents of this resolution propose to leave us? Is it possible that the Senator from Nebraska desires to take the position that a President of the United States can ignore the Senate of the United States in the exercise of its constitutional functions and can treat with contempt the sentiment of the people of the United States and keep this country in a state of war against the will of Congress and against the will of the overwhelming majority of the people of the United States? If he does, Mr. President, he pleads for an autocracy on the part of the United States that was never dreamed of by the founders of this Republic.

The Senator from Nebraska stated that for 130 years peace had been made through treaties with foreign powers. That is true. There happen to be only three such treaties—the one in 1814, growing out of the War of 1812; the one growing out of the Mexican War, and the one growing out of the Spanish-American War. It is true, and it has always been recognized by writers upon the Constitution, that treaties of peace must be made through the treaty-making power; but it was because no one dreamed that there would ever be a President of the United States such as we have in the White House to-day, so autocratic in his will, so regardless of the sentiment of the Senate of the United States, so regardless of the sentiment of the people of the country as to insist upon keeping the United States in a state of war unless he could have the treaty framed exactly as he wants it, and in this particular case unless the Senate and people of the United States are willing to surrender in exchange for peace the independence and the liberty of the people of the United States.

That is the question, and I do not believe the Senator from Nebraska will seriously contend that in this Republic of ours there can be said to be any such autocratic powers vested in the President. Suppose, Mr. President, that President Wilson had been elected last year and had three years to serve, then, under the theory advanced by the Senator from Nebraska, instead of waiting until the 4th of next March to secure again a government by the people, as will be secured, we would have to wait three long years, with the United States kept in a state of war, irrespective of the will of the people of this land.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. LENROOT. I yield.

Mr. KNOX. It is even worse than that; for what is to prevent the incoming President and then the succeeding President again, and so on ad infinitum, following the same policy, and keeping us in a perpetual state of war?

Mr. LENROOT. That would be possible theoretically, Mr. President, but not practically, because I am very sure the Senator will agree with me that when we have the solemn referendum next November, which the President so much desires, there will not be the slightest possibility that the next occupant of the White House will be a man who will have the least desire to pursue the footsteps of the present occupant of the White House.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an inquiry?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. LENROOT. I yield.

Mr. KING. How does the Senator expect a "solemn referendum," as it is called, at the coming election upon the single issue to which I understand the Senator is now addressing himself?

Mr. LENROOT. The issue of peace?

Mr. KING. That is to say, whether the treaty should be ratified with or without reservations?

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, fortunately for the Republican Party and very unfortunately for the party to which the Senator from Utah belongs, the President has made the issue very clear, because if the San Francisco convention shall follow the wish and the will of the President of the United States the issue will be the acceptance of the treaty of Versailles exactly as negotiated by the President of the United States, with all its surrenders of the liberties and the independence of the people of this country; and on that issue for every citizen of the United States who desires to preserve that independence there will be but one place for him to go, and that will not be with the party to which the Senator from Utah belongs; in fact, I am inclined to think the Senator from Utah upon that issue will himself come over to us, because the Senator from Utah falls under the condemnation of the President of the United States, because he, too, has voted for the reservations which the President states nullify the treaty.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield further to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly.

Mr. KING. The supposed condemnation of the President of the United States does not disturb me at all; but I can assure the Senator from Wisconsin that neither I nor other Democrats will be found supporting the Republican platform or the Republican nominees. The Republican platform will present so many questions, so many other issues, and will manifest such a devotion to the protection and preservation of the predatory interests that many people who might upon the single issue which the Senator suggests, if it were clearly presented, be inclined to support the Republican Party if it stood for the ratification of the treaty with reservations and the Democratic Party declared for unconditional ratification, be constrained to vote against the nominees of the Republican Party. However, let me say to the Senator, I do not think he is a good prophet if he now predicts unequivocally that the San Francisco convention will make such a declaration as the one indicated by him.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, first as a Republican, I feel a great deal of interest in the declarations the platform of the Republican Party will contain; but it never occurred to me to consult my distinguished friend from Utah to find out what the next Republican platform will contain, and, with all due deference to him, I do not believe that he knows. I also welcome the statement he has just made that at last the Democratic Party assembled at San Francisco proposes to be somewhat independent and not be ruled from the White House.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator pardon me again?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SPENCER in the chair). Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield further to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. LENROOT. I yield.

Mr. KING. Let me say to my distinguished friend, that I think the history of the Democratic Party from the days of Thomas Jefferson down to the present time indicates that that great party has always exhibited courage and independence, and that its members and supporters have always fought with courage and independence for their political convictions and principles; indeed if the success of the party had been the chief consideration they would have been less inflexible in their devotion to principle and less independent in their individual attitude to important issues which divided the people. The result has been that the Democratic Party has lacked that solidarity which has always, except in one case, characterized our Republican friends. But while I am trespassing upon the Senator's time let me point to the career of ex-President Roosevelt, a great American; the Republican Party under his leadership manifested a subserviency that was not complimentary to the great leaders of that party and to the men of distinguished intellectual ability who had for so many years been members of the Republican Party or to the rank and file of that party.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, with reference to the first statement the Senator from Utah has made regarding the independence of the members of the Democratic Party from Thomas Jefferson down, I will agree with him; but he must stop in his statement with March 4, 1913. He can not come down any later than that in his statement; and when he compares the subserviency, as he terms it, of the Republican Party under Theodore Roosevelt and the subserviency of the Democratic Party under Woodrow Wilson, he knows full well that up to very recently, when, I am glad to say, members of the Senator's party in this body and in the other body have begun to show their independence, and to realize that their obligations are to the people of this country, and not to the President of the United States—until a very few months ago no President ever occupied the White House who so completely dictated and ruled the members of his party in both Houses of Congress as did the present occupant of the White House.

The Senator from Utah would be the last Senator to deny it, because he has a habit of being quite independent himself; but the Senator must admit that at times from 1913 down he has been awfully lonesome in that independence.

With regard to the Senator's statement that he can not support the Republican nominee and the Republican platform if the Democratic Party shall obey the will of President Wilson with reference to this treaty, where is the Senator from Utah going to go during the many months intervening between now and November? Possibly the fishing is good in Utah; I do not know.

But, Mr. President, to conclude—and I have talked longer than I intended to—there was a time when the President and the Senator from Nebraska might have urged upon the Senate that in the position they were taking they represented the will of a majority of the people of the United States. They can do so no longer. Where has an election been held during the past two or three months that has sustained the President of the United States? Where has an election been held that has sustained the position of the President for the ratification of this treaty as submitted by him?

Was it in Nebraska, the State of the ranking Democratic member of the Committee on Foreign Relations, who has led this fight for the President for these many months? The President was repudiated there in the position that he has taken.

Was it in the State of Massachusetts where I am informed that not one Democratic delegate was permitted to be elected who stood for the President's position upon the treaty?

Where, either in Democratic or Republican primaries, have the President and his treaty without reservations been indorsed by the people? Was it in Georgia where they had a vote nearly two to one against the President's position, the opposition vote being divided between those who were against the treaty in any form and those who were for the treaty only with reservations?

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. LENROOT. I yield.

Mr. HARRIS. I am sure the Senator from Wisconsin would not intentionally make any statement that is not correct. The Georgia political contest was more a local factional fight than it was a treaty fight, and two-thirds of the people in Georgia are not only for the treaty but they are friends of the administration, and when the opportunity presents itself they will prove themselves to be such.

Mr. LENROOT. I should like to get some facts from the Senator from Georgia. I will ask the Senator whether Mr. Watson did not take the position squarely before the people of Georgia that he was against the treaty in any form?

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Watson takes a position against the administration and against the treaty on nearly every occasion. The supporters of my colleague, the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], are just as good administration men as are the supporters of Mr. Palmer. It was more a local fight there than it was a treaty fight. I think I am familiar with the conditions in my own State.

Mr. LENROOT. Then the Senator will not say that the people who voted for Watson were indorsing the administration. Now, then, we will go to our distinguished colleague, the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], who took such a very active part and made the issue very plain in Georgia. Does the Senator think that with the issue made by the Senator from Georgia, his colleague, against the treaty except with reservations, the vote that the senior Senator from Georgia received was an indorsement of the administration or the treaty without reservations?

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin further yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. LENROOT. I yield.

Mr. HARRIS. I make the statement that the supporters of Senator SMITH in Georgia are just as good administration men as the supporters of Mr. Palmer. The fight in Georgia was largely a factional political fight, with the national committeeman and delegates to the national convention at stake, and it was not so much a fight against the administration as the Senator believes it to have been.

Mr. LENROOT. I take it, then, the Senator's position is that the people of Georgia in this, the greatest question that has ever come before the people of this country, were much more interested in their own local affairs than in indorsing the administration. Of course, I will accept that statement if the Senator desires.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin further yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. LENROOT. I yield.

Mr. HARRIS. I should like to make one statement to the Senator. I have a letter from south Georgia, from one of the leading men in his county, in which he says that nearly all the people of that place voted for my colleague, the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH]. The writer informed me that every man who voted for Senator SMITH there was a friend of the administration, and was a friend of mine, and a friend of the treaty and the administration, and it was purely a local, factional political fight in Georgia, and not a treaty fight alone by any means.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, all that I can say, in view of the statement of the Senator from Georgia, is that the people of his State take a most peculiar way of indorsing the administration.

Now, Mr. President, just one word more and I am done.

I stated yesterday that if the President of the United States had permitted Senators of the United States to exercise their own judgment without pressure this treaty would have been ratified with the Lodge reservations. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] made a very pathetic appeal about "the sick man of the White House." We all sympathize with him in his illness, and hope for his speedy recovery. Nevertheless, every Senator knows that whenever the critical period came when there were Democratic Senators in sufficient number to vote to ratify this treaty, to secure the necessary two-thirds, at that critical time a letter always came from the "sick man of the White House" lining up his Democratic followers and holding them with him. No one can deny that. The fact is that if the President of the United States, having negotiated this treaty, as was his right, and then having submitted it to the Senate, as was his duty, had left the Senate to exercise its constitutional functions without interference from him, we would have been at peace to-day. The party, and the only party, who is responsible for our continuing in a state of war is the President of the United States, and the people of this country will hold him responsible.

The treaty lies in the White House. He refuses to resubmit it and state that he will permit his followers in the Senate to vote for it with the Lodge reservations. He refuses to attempt to negotiate a new treaty; and now we are told by the Senator from Nebraska that he will veto this joint resolution. Very well; so be it. We have done all that is possible in the passage of this joint resolution and in the action heretofore taken to secure peace with honor to the United States. If we shall fail in securing peace, then the responsibility will be not ours, but President Wilson's. In that event, we will have to wait for the "solemn referendum" in November, and on the 4th of March next we will have a President in the White House who will have a regard for the sentiments of the people of this country and we will once more have that which we have not had for many years—a government by the people.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I understand that no Senator desires to discuss the peace treaty at this time, so I ask unanimous consent that it be temporarily laid aside and that the Senate may proceed with the consideration of H. R. 10378, known as the shipping bill.

Mr. KING. I shall not object to the request of the Senator from Washington, but there are a number of Senators who desire to be present when the bill is taken up, and I promised to notify them. If the Senator will ask for a roll call——

Mr. JONES of Washington. I should like to get the bill up first.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator desire a roll call before the bill is taken up?

Mr. KING. No.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Washington? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10378) to provide for the promotion and maintenance of the American merchant marine, to repeal certain emergency legislation, and provide for the disposition, regulation, and use of property acquired thereunder, and for other purposes.

Mr. CURTIS. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gerry	Lenroot	Poindexter
Ball	Hale	Lodge	Pomerene
Calder	Harris	McCumber	Robinson
Capper	Harrison	McKellar	Sheppard
Chamberlain	Henderson	McNary	Smith, Md.
Colt	Johnson, Calif.	Myers	Smoot
Comer	Jones, Wash.	Nelson	Spencer
Culberson	Kellogg	Norris	Sterling
Curtis	Kendrick	Nugent	Townsend
Dial	Kenyon	Overman	Trammell
Edge	King	Phelan	Walsh, Mass.
Elkins	Knox	Pittman

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GAY], the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES], and the Senator from Colorado [Mr. PHIPPS] are detained at a meeting of the Postal Commission.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CURTIS in the chair). Fifty-one Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The Secretary will state the pending amendment.

The READING CLERK. The pending amendment is the amendment offered by the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], in section 26, page 27, line 25, to strike out, after the word "documented," down to and including the word "rate," on page 28, line 8, in the following words:

> The board and the Postmaster General, in aid of the development of a merchant marine adequate to provide for the maintenance and expansion of the foreign or coastwise trade of the United States and of a satisfactory postal service in connection therewith, shall from time to time determine the proper rate of compensation to be paid for such service, and the Postmaster General is hereby authorized to enter into contracts to pay for the carrying of such mails in such vessels at such rate.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator from Wisconsin has been called out, I assume. Probably he overlooked the fact that his is the pending amendment. I know the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] would like to be here when this amendment to the amendment is passed upon. There are other amendments of the committee which I do not think will require any debate. So I ask unanimous consent that we may temporarily pass over the section and the pending amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered. The next amendment will be stated.

The next amendment was, on page 28, after line 8, to insert:

> SEC. 27. That for the classification of vessels owned by the United States, and for such other purposes in connection therewith as are the proper functions of a classification bureau, all departments, boards, bureaus, and commissions of the Government are hereby directed to recognize the American bureau of shipping or any other similar organization approved by the board composed of American citizens, chartered in the United States, and 90 per cent of whose surveyors shall be American citizens, as their agency so long as the American bureau of shipping or such approved organization continues to be maintained as an organization which has no capital stock and pays no dividends: Provided, That the Secretary of Commerce and the chairman of the board shall each appoint one representative who shall represent the Government upon the executive committee of the American bureau of shipping, and the bureau shall agree that these representatives shall be accepted by them as active members of such committee. Such representatives of the Government shall serve without any compensation, except necessary traveling expenses: Provided further, That the official list of merchant vessels published by the Government shall hereafter contain a notation clearly indicating all vessels classed by the American bureau of shipping.

Mr. KING. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee what the full functions of this board are and why it is necessary to require all the persons engaged in shipping to recognize the bureau of shipping or similar organizations approved by the board?

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator, I presume, is familiar to a greater or less extent with Lloyd's shipping organization in England. This is intended to promote the development of an American organization of that kind and to perform the duties in connection with American vessels which Lloyd's does in connection with British vessels. In general, it will be the duty of this organization to supervise the construction of ships and classify them, so that when a ship is constructed it shall receive a classification by this bureau and our shipping people and the shipping world generally will understand what that means.

We have not been able, apparently, to develop an organization in this country to have the standing of Lloyd's. One reason for that probably is that we did not have very much shipping.

This American bureau has been in existence for quite a good many years. It was not very active until we commenced shipbuilding on a large scale, and it is now developing quite a splendid organization. It is the purpose of this legislation to encourage that American institution in such a way as to make it a great agency toward aiding and upbuilding the American merchant marine, as Lloyd's is in connection with the British merchant marine.

That, in general, is the purpose of the amendment. I will say to the Senator that this amendment has already been agreed to in the House of Representatives, except the provision in it which permits the recognition of another organization that may be composed of 90 per cent of Americans, and so on.

Mr. KING. I apprehended that the duties of the board created by this section were substantially of the character indicated by the Senator, and I was wondering if the Senator had taken into consideration, in the formulation of this provision, the question as to the right, the propriety, and the power of the Federal Government to impose upon those who are constructing ships the duty of submitting them for classification or other purposes to this board, and whether this board might not penalize those who are engaged in building ships, whether it might not impose upon them terms and conditions which would prove exceedingly obnoxious in the interest of the governmental boats, rather than in the interest of privately owned boats.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator misapprehends the scope of the section. It requires only all Government ships to be classified by this bureau. We do not attempt to say that if the Senator desires to build a ship, he must have it classified by the American bureau. He can go to Lloyd's and have it classified, or to any other organization he desires. As the similar provision passed the House there was some question as to whether it, by its terms, was made to apply to ships privately owned. The Senate committee thought we ought not, even if we could, attempt to go that far. So we confined it to vessels of the United States.

Mr. KING. I will say to the Senator that I understood, from the language of the act, that it went further than the Senator has stated; that it was an attempt by the Federal Government to impose restrictions upon private builders; but if it is limited to vessels constructed by the Government itself, I can see the wisdom of the provision.

Mr. JONES of Washington. It is so restricted. We hope that by having a great number of Government ships, and that business going to this company, it will develop a confidence in private shipbuilders and private owners, and that they will come to it. But they are not required to do it.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I do not desire to interfere with the orderly arrangement of going through the bill and disposing of the amendments which may be disposed of without much question. But I have several amendments to propose to different sections of the bill, some of which have been passed over, some of which are yet to be reached. I feel that the subject is one of extreme importance. As is well known, the Members of the Senate in their divided responsibilities act on so many committees, in a way specializing on various legislative subjects, which they will naturally be drawn to through membership on committees and through personal knowledge and contact, that I am afraid they have not, as a body, familiarized themselves with the great scope and intent of the pending bill. I am in thorough accord with its intent, but there are various sections and amendments proposed to sections in committee which I feel, if permitted to be left in the bill, will defeat its object. So I have prepared a short, general review of the bill. It is not a review of the bill entirely, but it points out particularly where I feel great danger lies, and I think the Senate should give careful consideration to those facts. I have tried to summarize it in a way so that it would be of convenience to the Members of the Senate.

So at this time I think it would be in order, and it will not, I may say to the chairman, in my judgment, interfere with the disposal of the bill in a proper way, but will perhaps to some extent enlighten Members so that we can dispose of it with more knowledge of the details of the measure.

Mr. President, I am convinced a large majority of the American people are desirous that the American Government retire from the administering of what has heretofore been classed as private business, repeal the various laws which have provided the Government and its officials with extraordinary war power, and have the Government return to its ordinary function of departmental activity and, as far as possible in these extravagant days, resume economical administration. Certainly, if we in Congress representing the American people are responsive to what I feel is an overwhelming demand to return business to private initiative, to take the Government out of business and conversely put more business in the Government, and to use the great power of the Government to cooperate rather than direct, then we must pass no additional laws that would tend to delay this return to normal conditions.

As a member of the Committee on Commerce, I have been much interested in the problem of the formation of a policy controlling the future administration and disposition of the merchant marine, and I fear very greatly that the bill under consideration if adopted without amendment or alteration in conference will result in practically a permanent Government-owned and administered merchant marine.

Mr. President, at the outset I want to express without qualification my sincere appreciation of the hard, unselfish, and devoted attention to this great problem that has been given by the chairman of the committee, the distinguished Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], and by a large majority of the members of the committee representing both great political parties, and I want to frankly admit that my experience as a member of that committee and in participating in many of the debates in the committee room on various phases of the proposed bill has shown me that little, if any, difference on political lines exists. I feel that the chairman particularly deserves great credit for evolving—as he did in the main—this general scheme for the future of the merchant marine as provided in this measure.

I thoroughly appreciate that the scope of the pending bill is not confined alone to the selling of the ships, but in addition to the development of the merchant marine through Federal assistance while the ships are being disposed of. My contention, however, is in effect that the bill is unnecessarily restricted, thus making it all the more difficult for the Shipping Board to carry out this very proper desire to build up the merchant marine. Frankly, in my judgment the bill was very much better when it came from the subcommittee and before it was amended in various details by the whole committee.

Discussing this general subject a few days ago, the chairman of the committee very properly expressed the opinion that we must have confidence in the Shipping Board and that the personnel must include the highest type of patriotic American citizens, and I agree with him; and therefore it makes it all the more necessary that we refer the details to the board with broad powers of discretion and not hemmed in by some of the very unnecessary restrictions to which I will attempt to draw attention.

I do not differ at all with the committee as regards general policy, but I do differ with some of these details. For instance, I do not believe it will be necessary for the Government to administer these suggested new lines at all, so to speak, if we will offer the proper inducements to private capital to take them off our hands. It is admitted that private capital and private interests can administer any lines at less expense than the Government. Then as a business proposition why is it not better for the Government to save this difference and, if at all, spend it in some form of encouragement to private interests to maintain the service required rather than the Government, especially as it is the announced intent of the bill to ultimately turn them over to private control. In other words, if we are prepared to lose money in order to establish certain routes, which fact was frankly admitted by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] and the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] in the debate in this Chamber last Monday, then why not save the added cost of governmental operation over that of private operation by turning them over to private operation as rapidly as possible?

It is entirely consistent and businesslike that the Shipping Board in making sales of ships shall insist on certain services being carried out, so that the great underlying desire on the part of the committee and the country of encouraging the development of a merchant marine to carry American goods to all the ports of the world will in every way be fostered through the adoption of this policy and at an admitted saving to the American taxpayer.

I do not differ with the chairman and a majority of the committee on the general policy as developed and provided in this bill, but I do differ as to some of the restrictions that have been put around different phases of the responsibility, which I am afraid in themselves will defeat the express object of the legislation.

In the first place the bill provides, in no uncertain language, under section 5, that the Shipping Board is authorized and directed to sell, as soon as practicable and consistent with good business methods, all the vessels acquired by the board. With this provision I unreservedly agree, but following this direction and emphatic statement such restrictions have been placed around sales that, in my judgment, it will be practically impossible for the Shipping Board to carry out the direct mandate prescribed by the bill. Before entering into some of the details in this connection I want to draw particular attention to the formation of the Shipping Board under the act. At the present time, as Congress well understands, the Shipping Board consists of five members, and it has been my information, following testimony by different members of the board at public hearings before the committee, that this number for an executive or administrative board has been found to be unwieldy, and that if the constitution of the board is to be changed at all the membership should rather be diminished than increased, thus saving money on salaries of the extra commissioners to devote to a more highly paid and efficient staff for the actual organization and operation of the board. Personally, as I have frankly stated on the floor of this body, I am an advocate of centralized responsibility. I believe in the truth of the old saying "that the best committee is a committee of three with two of the members incapacitated for duty"; so in the administration of this large responsibility, the greatest individual responsibility under the Government, I am convinced that a board of seven is unwieldy, unbusinesslike, and can not result in that effective administration which is necessary in such a large responsibility. There is always a president of every big corporation, and there is naturally a board of directors. If there was one man with final authority above and beyond the Shipping Board, then I would have no criticism, but with a board formulated as provided in this act there is no final authority; it furnished absolutely a divided authority of seven; I feel that this is a mistake.

We find in section 5 that even after the subcommittee had provided what appealed to me to be unnecessary restriction in demanding that vessels should not be sold excepting under various provisos, limitations, and restrictions the full committee has seen fit to add to the general language of the original act a further proviso that no sales shall be made at a less price than the cost at the time of making such sale of constructing such vessels of similar type in private yards in the United States after deducting the depreciation. Let us see what this means. On the face of it it sounds reasonable, and I believe with this general thought and without a more careful, earnest consideration the committee accepted this additional restriction. At first flush it would seem reasonable that a purchaser of one of our ships should pay an amount equal to the cost of a similar ship built in a private American yard less depreciation as provided, but if in insisting on such a hard and fast rule we are tying up the Shipping Board in such a way they have absolutely no latitude whatsoever we should stop to consider the result of such a policy. Suppose some of our ships become more or less obsolete in type—and everyone knows that because of the rapid development along these lines this is possible—yet under this bill the Shipping Board would be held to the position that they could not sell the ships, or at least that they could not make any reduction on the price because of obsolete conditions, because of accident, or anything which might occur. The Senators will note that a committee called by the Shipping Board and of which Mr. Meyer is chairman has just recently recommended that the prices of construction in foreign yards also be considered, and why should they not be? "That the prices should be fixed upon the basis of present prices for reproduction, considering both foreign and domestic production costs," says this committee. This is not only reasonable, it is sound. For, if domestic prices are too high, the shipping man will buy abroad rather than at home; we can not stop them; and foreign prices must necessarily be considered as well as domestic costs.

> That no sale shall be made at a less price than the cost at the time of making such sale of constructing vessels of similar type in private yards of the United States, after deducting the depreciation charge against the vessels sold generally allowed in shipping operations—reads section 5 of the bill. Inelastic, copper-riveted provision binding the Shipping Board. And not only binding the Shipping Board and restricting it in the exercise of its own best judgment but most inconsistent and even opening strange possibilities.

"Depreciation" in shipping circles is a word of marvelous elasticity and one on whose definition few shipping men agree. Some concerns, for instance, arbitrarily charge 5 per cent against each of their ships each year; others, I am informed, charge as high as 10 per cent. Others may not charge an annual depreciation, but at the end of a fixed period, say, 5 or 10 years, figure that a ship has depreciated 15 or 25 per cent, as a survey may indicate.

So, it is actually possible that the depreciation to be charged against a vessel really might equal the price of construction in a domestic or foreign yard at present construction figures. It is conceivable that depreciation allowances even might exceed a vessel's present value, and the Shipping Board in selling such craft to a man actually would owe the purchaser money on the transaction. This may sound fantastic, Mr. President, but it is not impossible; so that this provision may work both ways. Is there a Member of this Senate who does not thoroughly appreciate that with this hard and fast rule the Shipping Board's hands are tied, and a shipping concern wanting to purchase a ship would not be satisfied to purchase an old ship under such conditions—and in these days a three or four year old ship is considered old—at the same price it would cost to reproduce it less depreciation as one could purchase a new ship with modern features at precisely the same relative cost? I fear it simply means that if this bill is passed with such an inflexible provision that the United States Government will continue to administer a merchant marine until this bill is amended or repealed, and I contend that if the bill is passed with such a provision as this in it we might just as well make up our minds that we are going to continue to administer a merchant marine with all its attendant loss.

In other sections the bill gives the Shipping Board most unusual and unparalleled authority. They can establish new passenger and freight rates, or either, without regard to cost or whether maintained at a loss or otherwise; they are permitted to disburse their income from earnings or sale of ships without congressional or other supervision; they form one of the few departments of the Government having such authority without direct appropriations from Congress. Yet for some entirely unexplained reason in the matter of selling ships we hold them down to an impracticable and inconsistent hard-and-fast rule, which in effect, in my judgment, will compel them to remain in business at the expense of the American people.

In other words, in the bill you give them unlimited discretion to spend millions of dollars of income, wisely or unwisely, but you hold them up to secure arbitrary prices for ships, irrespective of condition and whether there is a market at such prices or otherwise. If the board can be trusted to spend millions of the taxpayers' money without supervision, they surely can likewise be trusted to conserve the taxpayers' property.

Of course, if a majority of this Senate favors Government ownership and Government administration, there can be no objection to this provision.

I can hear those who differ with this view replying, "But this restriction does not necessarily mean Government ownership and administration."

Why does it not?

If we do not sell the ships, surely the Government must operate them, and if shipping men will not buy on the arbitrary terms provided by the bill, we can not compel them to do so, and certainly that means continued Government ownership and operation.

No, Mr. President, you will never withdraw from Government operation until you give common-sense discretion as to the sale of ships to the same power to which under this bill you are giving practically unlimited discretion in the matter of expenditure.

I do not believe that a majority in the Senate, nor even a majority of the membership on either side of the aisle, wants permanent Government ownership of the merchant marine. I am absolutely convinced in my mind that the people of the United States are opposed to Government ownership, and that probably 95 per cent of them share the view expressed by President Wilson in December, 1915, when he said:

> In the task of building up an adequate merchant marine for America private capital must ultimately undertake and achieve, as it has undertaken and achieved every other like task amongst us in the past, with admirable enterprise, intelligence, and vigor.

In his valedictory report, June 10, 1919, Chairman Hurley, retiring chairman of the Shipping Board, said:

> The Shipping Board recommends private ownership and operation as a fundamental policy for commercial shipping.

This view was indorsed just two months later by Chairman Payne, who, on succeeding Mr. Hurley, expressed a—> desire to sell the (Government) ships just as fast as the private concerns will absorb them.

There are the views of the President of the United States and two high Government officials in intimate touch with the shipping situation. The views of the business world are unanimously of the same tenor, and I find them well expressed by a special committee of one of the greatest, broadest, and most comprehensive business organizations in the country—the Chamber of Commerce of the United States. In a report to the directors of the chamber October 31, 1919, a committee specially appointed to study and report on ocean transportation gave its findings in the following language:

> The immediate problem before the country is to determine what disposition is to be made of the Shipping Board fleet—whether it shall be continued under Government ownership and operation, whether there should be Government ownership and private operation or private ownership and private operation. * * * The committee is unanimously of the opinion that private ownership and private operation is the sound course, and that all the ships owned by the Government or under contract should be sold to private companies or individuals, to be operated by them for their own account.

No qualification about that recommendation, Mr. President; no "ifs" or "buts" or "howevers," but a straightforward, businesslike recommendation that the Government get out of the shipping business and restore it to the hands of private enterprise, initiative, and sound business ownership and operation. The committee then goes further and gives reasons for its recommendation, saying:

> It is to be observed that under Government ownership and operation it is almost inevitable that considerations entirely apart from economic reasons will constantly interrupt the natural courses of management and control of ships and trades. The management of cargo-carrying ships is one of the most complicated businesses in the world and one that requires many years' experience to qualify a person as an expert, and a successful merchant marine depends upon the development of a large class of energetic, resourceful shipping men from the highest to the lowest rank, all animated by a spirit that would not be expected of Government employees.

Let me interrupt for an instant to observe that this committee does not seem to labor under the impression that a lawyer or a factional political sympathizer is particularly fitted to operate the shipping business, but has an impression that it should be handled by shipping men. The committee thus continues:

> Government ownership and operation of ships would be destructive of the initiative and flexibility in ship management that are essential to the success of the business, and would cost more than private ownership and operation.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. EDGE. I yield.

Mr. CALDER. The Senator a moment ago referred to the possibility of continued Government operation, as I understood him, in the quotation from the United States Chamber of Commerce.

Mr. EDGE. Yes.

Mr. CALDER. Has the Senator's attention been called to the fact that the Shipping Board contends that they made very large profits last year from the operation of Government ships, and has the Senator anything to say about that?

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I will reach that particular subject a little later and comment briefly on the question of profits derived from Government operation.

Mr. CALDER. During the past year or two?

Mr. EDGE. During the past two years.

Here, let me observe, Mr. President, that this additional cost would be twofold: First, in higher freight rates, which the people would have to shoulder; and, second, in taxes, which the people would have to pay. The United States Government never was organized or designed to make money, either primarily or as a side line. When the Government tries to make money it invariably loses money; true, it possibly may show a paper profit for a time, as the Shipping Board did, but even in rolling up this alleged profit the people are taking their money out of one pocket to put it into another. This is not only logic, it is a fact, just as true as the fact that the earth is round, because the people themselves are "the Government." If a man has a deficit of $50 in his business and puts $100 in his cash register out of his own savings account, he hardly is "making a profit" of $50.

The committee report continues:

> Again, the uncertainties created by varying congressional action would result detrimentally to any attempt Government officials might make to establish policies, and permanency of policy is a requisite in building up trade with ships.

That statement, Mr. President, has been so corroborated in the short time the Government has been in the shipping business that no elaboration is necessary.

The committee then takes up the second of the three alternatives, and says:

> The objections to Government owned and operated ships apply with only a little less force to privately operated Government-owned ships. There would be in this case the same uncertainties in policies; local and political influence would be exerted in the allocation of the ships to be chartered; governmental restrictions would limit freedom of action; new capital and experience sufficient for the purpose would be difficult to enlist in the operation of Government-owned ships; established companies would only take over Government ships during their inability to own their own ships—> or while awaiting the determination of world conditions affecting overseas trade and the market for tonnage; business men would not deem it expedient to invest the capital required to establish the foreign connections and agencies essential to the development of a successful shipping business. The immediate result of these conditions would be a temporary effort to establish a privately operated Government-owned merchant marine, while ultimately the Government would have upon its hands a fleet of vessels for which, when the Government was again ready to dispose of them, there might not be a market. In this event, the problem unwisely attacked would await a fresh attempt at solution, with much less favorable opportunities for success. Meantime, competing nations that, through years of successful endeavor, have established consistent policies and closely knit relations in the profitable trades throughout the world, would make it exceedingly difficult for American ship operators to compete with them.

Which we know to be true—

I did not and do not intend, Mr. President, to read this whole report, though the temptation is great, as it expresses the sentiment of the whole business world. One more extract, however:

> But it may be said that if the ships are sold to private companies they will be used for private gain, and that the national needs for a merchant marine will not be met. It is the opinion of the committee that private enterprises and private initiative, working through ordinary commercial impulses, will develop a merchant marine and meet the national necessities much more nearly than if undertaken by the Government. * * * The competition in world trade will be with privately owned foreign ships, and to meet such competition our ships must be similarly operated.

As I have said, Mr. President, that is the business men's businesslike opinion on the ownership and management of the American merchant marine. Certainly, no opinion should receive higher consideration by Congress than the views of trained, experienced, expert business minds. Thirteen men from the North and the South and the East and the West composed this committee, representing nine lines of business activity and including a lawyer and a farmer.

I do not propose to enter into present argument against Government ownership or Government management of nongovernmental business. The minority which at one time favored the policy of Government ownership has shrunk so greatly since concrete Government operation of the railroads and the wires as now to be almost negligible, and of those who still hold to that policy many have turned to the adoption of the so-called Plumb plan, where most of the Government-ownership advocates really belong.

The real question as I see it, Mr. President, to be dealt with is not how much can the Government get for the ships, but how much can the buyer afford to pay and work out his investment against foreign competition? Under what system of reasoning is it assumed that the United States Government can operate ships any more economically than can our private shipping interests? Certainly all experience and admission in this Chamber lead conclusively to the opposite view. Surely our administration of the railroads is quite parallel to this situation and could not in any way permit of a feeling that the Government can administer business more economically than private capital.

What practical unknown advantage can there possibly be which will enable the Government to outwit private energy, enterprise, initiative, and determination in conducting their own business interests? All proof, all experience, leads to the opposite conclusion. Then, therefore, is it not more imperative, if we are to carry out the mandate of the bill which directs the sale of the ships, that the Shipping Board, or whatever agency may have it in charge, shall be delegated with some discretionary authority and not be held as by a vise which would practically make sales impossible. Congress can not act as a sales agent. Congress, therefore, must delegate some discretion somewhere. The members of the Shipping Board are appointed by the President, are confirmed by the Senate, are chargeable to the Government for their acts, and, frankly, I have sufficient faith and confidence in the American public servant to feel that he will use his best business judgment and not sacrifice the property of the people.

Conversely, I have the same confidence in the Americanism of the American business man, and believe the Government should cooperate with him as far as may be legitimate, for in helping American business the Government helps every person in the country. The American shipping man has not had smooth seas to sail, and from the experience of the past it might seem that his business barometer does not yet read "set fair." As we are told by statistical historians, the tonnage of American vessels reached its maximum in 1861, with a total of 2,496,894 tons, but at the close of the Civil War this had decreased to about a million and a half. Until 1880 the yearly average was about 1,500,000 tons, which declined until 1888, when it had shrunk over 50 per cent, to 726,213 tons. After the Spanish-American War there was a slight increase, to 800,000, and in 1900 the total reached 943,750 tons. By 1910 the tonnage had fallen to 782,517 tons, but advanced to 1,066,288 tons by June, 1914. At the close of the fiscal year of 1916 this had further increased to 2,185,008 tons.

The World War created an American-owned merchant marine, and on June 30, 1919, we had seagoing vessels of 1,000 tons or over aggregating a total of 2,058 ships and 7,300,022 gross tons, as against 755 ships of 1,000 tons or over, aggregating 2,128,788 tons, on July 30, 1914.

In trying to avoid handicapping our own ship operators by charging them almost prohibitive prices we all must consider the tremendous financial aid given to private owners by foreign Governments in subsidies and in other ways, a subject which was referred to by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] in the debate on Monday. The French Government, for instance, now is contributing about $4,000,000 a year as construction, equipment, and navigation bounties, besides an even larger sum paid to a large number of companies for carrying the mails. The postal subventions amount to over $5,000,000, and the more important of the sibsidies are paid not only for the carrying of the mails, but to assure quicker transportation and more frequent service than otherwise would be provided by the steamship companies. I understand, however, that the French postal subventions and bounties are more liberal than the payments of any other country for similar purposes.

The British Government's aid to shipping takes the form of appropriations for maintaining a force of naval reserves, of admiralty subventions paid to owners of certain vessels, and of mail subsidies. Appropriations of $2,000,000 a year are designed to provide a supply of seamen on which the navy may draw for crews to man the war vessels, but at the same time they perform great service for the merchant marine. Owners of certain fast steamers receive admiralty subventions, but these ships must be maintained in such condition that the Government easily can convert them into naval cruisers. But the mail subsidies form the largest part of the Government aid given to British shipping, and the strongest and fastest lines of ships under the British flag have been supported with great liberality. I am informed that the payment annually received by British companies for carrying the mail from the United Kingdom to foreign countries or British colonies runs over $5,000,000.

Thus the British subsidies assure frequent and fast mail service to foreign countries and British colonies; they stimulate the building of merchant craft which may be of great service in time of war; and they strengthen British shipping the better to meet the commercial competition of its rivals.

All this, Mr. President, is merely a recitation of facts. I simply say if we do not positively help American shipping by subsidies or subventions, at least do not let us handicap it by imposing onerous prices for vessels which it wants and needs and which we wish to and must dispose of.

Let us not keep a Government of unlimited treasury resources in competition with private American enterprise, which will have all it can swing to in meeting the competition of foreign shipping, financially reinforced by foreign Governments, without the handicap of American Government rivalry and restrictions to burden it further. Do not let us squeeze the last dollar out of the American shipping men in the initial price of the vessels we propose to sell them. We have a law against unfair competition and restraint of trade in private business; we should have at least a moral objection to unfair competitions and restraint of trade by the Government in respect to private enterprise.

But, let us assume for the sake of argument, that the Government will continue to administer the merchant marine, which in my judgment under this bill they will be compelled to do. Let us consider the experience which we have already had, which is of some value. I have been informed that at a recent conference held between the Shipping Board and the committee of manufacturers and salesmen, called to consider ways and means of selling the ships, it was frankly stated that the profits of the board from operations of the fleet had been approximately 7½ per cent, no deduction being made for depreciation, and that if depreciation had been charged up as a capital charge no profit would be shown. From this information it is a safe deduction that in the present declining freight market operations by the Government are already on a losing basis. When the Government loses money the people, of course, pay the bill, and, if the Government could in any way maintain high freight rates because of their control of the fleet and thus show a paper profit the people would pay the bill just the same.

We can not overlook the fact that in competition with other countries—and that is precisely what our merchant marine must face—we must give paramount consideration to the cost of their fleets and of their administration. How can we say to the American shipowner that we will not sell him a ship at less than it can be built in America to-day, less the depreciation, when it is a well-known fact that Great Britain has sold to her shipping interests a large part of the tonnage built during the war at £20 per ton—less than $100 a ton—and it is a further well-known fact that Great Britain had at the end of the war, in spite of damage by submarines, and so forth, over 7,000,000 net tons of shipping, equal to over 15,000,000 tons dead-weight, consisting of units of over 6,000 tons dead-weight. I think my figures are correct when I state that our Government will have approximately 13,000,000 tons dead-weight of units of over 6,000 tons to sell. It is a well-known fact that that part of the Great Britain tonnage which was built before the war did not cost the owners a capital investment of more than $75 per ton. How, then, is our Government, or our private shipping interests, going to compete unless we calmly and frankly realize and recognize these conditions and charge off or sell accordingly?

Mr. President, the wise business man when he has suffered a loss does not mulishly clinch his teeth and say, "Well, somebody has to make that up and I will stand pat." No; the wise business man who loses frankly takes his loss and then gets busy to repair the loss in some other direction.

In consideration of this very point, the Chamber of Commerce of the United States last December took a referendum of its members on the question, "Absorption by the Government of the difference between the war cost and present value—of the merchant marine—as a war loss," as recommended by a special committee. Thirteen hundred and ninety-five members voted that the Government should swallow this war loss, and 61 voted against it, a proportion of approximately 23 to 1. Never lived a business man who did not at some time have to charge up something to profit and loss. The wise man philosophically accepts the loss and plugs up the hole so it shall not continue; the foolish man sends good money after bad.

There is not an activity, either purely governmental or undertaken by the Government, in which the Government did not lose money in the war. Are the people at large, who, too, have borne their full share of the war's burden, to be taxed either directly or indirectly for Government operation of the merchant marine while we haggle over mere money? We daily see miserable little pennies wrung from the poor children in taxes, for what? Largely to make up the losses incurred through the operation of railroads by the Government, in part to make up losses sustained by the Government in wasteful and extravagant incursions into the real estate business and the clothing business and the wholesale and retail grocery trade. "Let the Government pay the deficits" is a fine theory—until the people at last realize that they are "the Government" and that the children's pennies are taken to make up these deficits.

As far as I can gather, no data has yet been compiled to show what the Government has lost between the prices it paid for camp sites and camp buildings and the prices it obtained in selling them; between its purchase and sales figures on, literally, thousands of articles it built or bought during the war and has disposed of since the armistice. We have, for instance, seen high-class automobiles, costing the Government, say, $2,000, sold for a few dollars, and any automobile wrecker will tell you that even a machine ruined by fire is worth probably $50 in salvage. The War Department has said that in selling a wide variety of supplies it had realized 76 per cent on a cost of $567,000,000 up to October 3 last. On its railway material the realization was 99 per cent; on aeronautical supplies, 16 per cent; on buildings, and so forth, of the construction department, 50 per cent; on material of the Ordnance Department, 63 per cent; on Quartermaster's supplies, 80 per cent.

Far be it from me to dispute the figures of the War Department, but it certainly is not improper for me to say that I do not think the department has at all underestimated its realization estimates. It has burned or otherwise destroyed, we are reliably informed, literally millions of dollars of valuable lumber, and aircraft parts and tires and other articles. Has "all Rome sent up a universal howl"? It has not; yet some persons hold up their hands in horrified protest at the mere suggestion of selling ships at a comparatively small loss, in order to save the American people probably millions of dollars in the future.

Our merchant marine was constructed under the expensive conditions of the great World War, with haste rather than price the only consideration—and rightly so. Can any reasonable man expect the Government to get out of this war investment in peace times without loss, or, on the other hand, by its own ownership or management, to earn a reasonable interest on that inflated investment, to say nothing of deterioration and other losses? Do not, however, send good money after bad. Automobile models change almost daily, through almost daily improvements in mechanism, and ships change just as quickly through improvements and inventions of a score of descriptions. Remember, also, that Mr. Hurley testified before the committee that 13,885,106 dead-weight tons of our ships were built at a net cost of $180 a ton, and that some ships, because of spot delivery, were sold as high as $210 a dead-weight ton, according also to Mr. Hurley. Is the profit of the past to be taken into consideration in estimating the possible losses of the present or future? It should be, and the prospective loss average would be materially scaled down. Everyone must realize the market for ships is daily lessening as new ships are launched. Already our ships are referred to as of old design.

Let us sum it all up in this way: Are the American people to accept a comparatively small loss in the sale of their ships, or face a continuing loss and drain on the pocketbooks by sticking to Government ownership or Government management? Are the private shipping concerns to whom the President, the business men of the land, and the Shipping Board itself advocate turning over the shipping business—are they to be kept out of their business by an obstinate, hard-and-fast policy, which is "penny-wise and pound-foolish"? For the Shipping Board itself said on June 10, 1919:

> The Shipping Board recommends private ownership and operation as a fundamental policy for commercial shipping. The Government should, therefore, contemplate retirement from commercial shipbuilding, ship-owning, and ship-operating activities at the earliest date which may be convenient and practical, in order—
> (a) To give our overseas trade the full benefit of competitive service;
> (b) To leave steamship operators free to render this competitive service; and
> (c) To impart to present and prospective steamship operators that confidence which they must feel before they can be expected to invest their money in existing ships and to place the orders for new ships, without which the outlook for the American shipbuilding industry will not be encouraging.

It is not often that a Government department recommends its own retirement from business. The realization of such a necessity must have been overwhelming to have evoked such a report from a Government board. That was the recommendation of Chairman Hurley and Commissioner Donald, Vice Chairman Stevens dissenting. That proportion was two to one; I believe that in the country at large the proportion would be twenty to one, as shown in the referendum to which I have referred.

The American Government spent over $3,000,000,000 during the war in building up a most necessary merchant marine. I have nothing whatever to say about the excess cost of these ships, because it was during war times, and we must accept it as a part of the excess war costs; but for us now, facing the problems of peace, to mulishly clinch our teeth and say that because it has cost us so much and because present prices are so great we are going to insist, irrespective of other conditions or of competitive fleets, that the American business man is to make up this deficit is unbusinesslike and unsound, as well as unfair. I would like to see this $3,000,000,000 cashed in as rapidly as good business would permit and a billion and a half, or whatever we could obtain, quickly turned into the Treasury of the United States to relieve onerous taxation now being levied on the people. And allow me to prophesy to you that any legislation enacted which through its unwise, unsound restriction holds these ships longer and longer until they become less and less valuable will be a policy which will not be to the best interest of any class of the American people. I do not want the ships uselessly sacrificed, but I do want the ships sold. I do not want the Government to continue administering this business any longer than is absolutely essential, because I am convinced that every additional day that it does so there will be that much greater deficit charged against the taxpayers of the country, and the assets in the shape of ships owned by the Government will naturally depreciate more and more. In selling ships necessary lines and routes can be insisted on as a part of the sale agreement, so why should the Government continue in the business? Either we must pass legislation to give every opportunity to carry out the direction of this bill or we must pass legislation providing for Government continued ownership and administration, and not do it by this indirect method. My view of this section is that it should be stripped of all its restrictions and that following the words now appearing in the bill, "that the Shipping Board is authorized and directed to sell," should follow a few words, "using their best judgment under such affirmative direction."

Just a word to review the next section on the same subject, section 6. The subcommittee report dealing with a sale to aliens was, I think, admirable, for it practically left this responsibility to the board's discretion, only permitting them to sell to aliens at all, however, if unable to sell to American citizens, following diligent efforts to do so. But there has since been added to that section another line, which reads "that they shall not be permitted to sell to aliens any vessels having a dead-weight tonnage of over 6,000 tons." At my suggestion, I had added, in order somewhat to qualify such a restriction, the words "unless such vessels are over 10 years of age." This, I believe, helps it somewhat. No Member of this Senate is more desirous than I am to retain American ownership and registry of every useful ship now flying the American flag. That is not a point which permits of argument, and I do not attempt to classify any different type of patriotism in the membership of this body, but I am ready to meet a situation without fear of sentimental objection when it is clearly and obviously to the best interest of the taxpayers of the country.

That portion of the bill which states that diligent effort to secure American buyers must be made is wise. I most assuredly want to see these ships purchased by Americans, but certainly the members of the Shipping Board, whose sincerity as patriotic Americans should be beyond question by the Senate, which first confirms them, should not be restricted by a condition that, in case they can not sell certain undesirable ships to Americans, they should be prohibited from selling them to some one else. Do you think that the sentiment of the American people is such as to prefer that these ships shall be indefinitely tied up at our docks as an additional expense simply because some of them happened to be over 6,000 tons, but yet were useless to the American merchant marine? If we agree with the testimony of Judge Payne, formerly chairman of the Shipping Board, and other members, we have to-day a number of such ships, and under this positive prohibition we must simply hold these ships, because they are over 6,000 tons, pay thousands of dollars for their upkeep, and get absolutely no income from their ownership. The bill under consideration permits ships under 6,000 tons to be sold to aliens; this has been acknowledged as wise and is so reported to us. If that policy is to prevail, that we can sell any American ship under 6,000 tons, and it is a well-known fact that we have several hundred such ships to-day which we know are practically useless to our merchant marine, then on the same principle, leaving that decision as we do to the discretion of the Shipping Board, why should we not leave the matter of the sale of ships of over 6,000 tons likewise to the discretion of the Shipping Board, when all the testimony before the committee confirmed the statement that some are useless to our merchant marine?

The further amendment providing that this prohibition does not apply to ships over 10 years of age will help somewhat, but will not entirely dispose of this question. Suppose, for instance, one of our ships of over 6,000 tons met with an accident, or that there was a fire or accident occasioned by a storm, as often happens, and that it had been determined that it would not pay to recondition said ship; yet they could not be sold under this law to an alien, no matter how useless they were to the American Government. Is this an American business policy or not to adopt? An American ship of over 6,000 tons might be wrecked on a foreign coast and the expense of salvaging it and reconditioning it be prohibitive to an American, while a near-by foreigner might be glad to buy it, as possible to salvage or recondition in the land where it was wrecked; yet, under this bill, that ship would be a 90 or 100 per cent loss to the United States, instead of only a 40 or 50 per cent loss. Neither business nor patriotism can be run by a hard and fast, inelastic rule, nor does elasticity at all weaken patriotism—it even may strengthen it and make it the more concretely effective.

I am not at this time proposing to discuss the inequality of existing coastwise laws, which, as probably all well know, prohibit foreign-built ships from competing in coastwise trade either with freight or passengers. I am entirely in sympathy with the provisions of this bill which limits coastwise freight business to American ships, but you probably know that during the war certain foreign-built ships were by special license permitted to enter into coastwise trade, and under section 24, as it appears in the bill we are discussing, it provides that foreign-built vessels admitted to the coastwise trade under such measure and which are wholly owned by persons who are citizens of the United States, and foreign-built vessels owned by the United States at the time of the enactment of this law, if sold to such persons, may operate in the coastwise trade as long as they are owned by such persons. In other words, this in effect permits a few foreign-built vessels to come within a special provision permitting them to compete with American-built vessels, but leaves out a number of foreign-built vessels which have been owned for many years by American companies and are now not permitted to do a coastwise trade business, simply because they were not given such license.

As stated, I am not prepared to argue that any foreign-built vessels should be permitted to compete with our coastwise trade, especially if it relates to freight; but I do contend that if one or two companies have succeeded in securing this consideration, any other foreign-built vessel wholly owned by American citizens should have a like privilege or all should be prohibited. I might say, however, that this has been corrected by the amendment which was adopted yesterday.

As I inferred, the entire question of coastwise restrictions should be given very earnest attention by Congress, especially now that we are extending our coastwise laws to include such distant places as the Philippines, Porto Rico, the Virgin Islands, and the like. I think, too, there should be a distinct difference in considering freight and passenger privileges. It does seem somewhat unusual that an American citizen can not travel from the Philippines on any vessel unless built in the United States. If the United States lines were conducting a full and complete service from all these insular possessions, it would be quite a different matter, but as is well known such is not the case.

I always oppose the enactment of a law that it is perfectly obvious can not be enforced. Such laws may have sentimental effect, but when we consider section 41 of the pending bill, which amends the shipping act of 1916, to provide "that no corporation, partnership, or association shall be deemed a citizen of the United States unless all the securities of such corporation, partnership, or association are at all times wholly and bona fide owned by citizens of the United States," we are enacting into law what we perfectly well know to be a section absolutely impossible of enforcement. Many of these corporations are listed on the stock exchanges. Any alien can buy stock on the exchanges at any time. Such a provision is simply making our corporations innocent lawbreakers, and thus subject to punishment for unintentional violation. No one can or would accuse the Federal Reserve Board or the Banking and Currency Committees of either the Senate or the House of the least laxity in safeguarding the United States and its business interests; yet, with the corporations recently authorized to engage in export financing, they did not attempt to go to such an extreme as that. The provision in that law is that "a majority of the shares of the capital stock of any such corporation shall at all times be held and owned by citizens of the United States," and so on. The Senate may not consider "a majority" of American ownership sufficient, but, on the other hand, 100 per cent American ownership in a corporation is absolutely impossible of enforcement.

The same section of this bill goes further and provides "that any such company operating vessels exclusively in foreign countries shall be deemed a citizen of the United States if at least 75 per cent of the value of all its securities are at all times owned by bona fide citizens of the United States." This provision is not so bad, and I would have no objection to it if it provided that the majority of the stock should be so held, which I think should be insisted on at all times. But, again, the same difficult situation arises as to being able to hold complete control of so large a block as 75 per cent of the stock and indirectly to make of such corporations violators of the laws.

Mr. President, this bill is designed to create and develop to the uttermost an American merchant marine. I yield to none in enthusiastic desire to see a real American merchant marine—American from keel to mizzentop and from figurehead to rudder post; but it is not going to be an efficient merchant marine if the captain is instructed to furl the mainsail at 6 bells, regardless of conditions, or to reef the flying jib at 3 bells even though the weather may be calm. In peace times, the captain of a ship is left to his own judgment and discretion, unfettered by ironclad instructions. And to exactly the same extent should we trust an American Shipping Board, appointed by an American President, and confirmed by an American Senate. We are giving them a big job to handle. Let us permit them to carry it out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GERRY in the chair). The Secretary will continue the reading of the bill.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, on page 29, after line 7, to insert:

SEC. 28. That cargo vessels documented under the laws of the United States may carry not to exceed 12 persons in addition to the crew between any ports or places in the United States or its Districts, Territories, or possessions, or between any such port or place and any foreign port, or from any foreign port to another foreign port, and such vessels shall not be held to be "passenger vessels" or "vessels carrying passengers" within the meaning of the inspection laws and the rules and regulations thereunder: Provided, That nothing herein shall be taken to exempt such vessels from the laws, rules, and regulations respecting life-saving equipment: Provided further, That when any such vessel carries persons other than the crew as herein provided for the owner, agent, or master of the vessel shall first notify such persons of the presence on board of any dangerous articles, as defined by law, or of any other condition or circumstance which would constitute a risk of safety for passenger or crew.

Failure on the part of the owner, agent, or master of the vessel to give such notice shall subject the vessel to a penalty of $500, which may be mitigated or remitted by the Secretary of Commerce upon a proper representation of the facts.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 30, after line 5, to insert:

SEC. 29. That no merchandise shall be transported by water, or by land and water, on penalty of forfeiture thereof, between points in the United States, including Districts, Territories, and possessions thereof embraced within the coastwise laws, either directly or via a foreign port, or for any part of the transportation, in any other vessel than a vessel built in and documented under the laws of the United States and wholly owned by persons who are citizens of the United States, or vessels to which the privilege of engaging in the coastwise trade is extended by sections 18 or 24 of this act. No agent or employee of a common carrier shall check baggage, issue bills of lading, or otherwise arrange for through carriage of property between ports or places in the United States, including Districts, Territories, and possessions embraced within the coastwise laws, when all or any part of the carriage is in a foreign vessel, and no person in the capacity of agent or otherwise, directly or indirectly, by means of a ticket, understanding, order, or any form of contract whatsoever, shall sell or contract to sell to any person the right to travel by water, or by land and water, either directly or via a foreign port, or for any part of the transportation, on a foreign ship between ports or places in the United States, including Districts, Territories, and possessions embraced within the coastwise law. Any person violating any of the provisions of this section shall, upon conviction, be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I ask that section 29 may go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, section 29 will be passed over.

The next amendment was, on page 31, after line 7, to insert:

SEC. 30. That no common carrier shall charge, collect, or receive, for transportation subject to the interstate commerce act of persons or property, under any joint rate, fare, or charge, or under any export, import, or other proportional rate, fare, or charge, which is based in whole or in part on the fact that the persons or property affected thereby is to be transported to, or has been transported from, any port in a possession or dependency of the United States, or in a foreign country, by a carrier by water in foreign commerce, any lower rate, fare, or charge than that charged, collected, or received by it for the transportation of persons, or of a like kind of property, for the same distance, in the same direction, and over the same route, in connection with commerce wholly within the United States, unless the vessel so transporting such persons or property is, or unless it was at the time of such transportation by water, documented under the laws of the United States, and owned by persons who are citizens of the United States. Whenever the board is of the opinion, however, that adequate shipping facilities to or from any port in a possession or dependency of the United States or a foreign country are not afforded by vessels so documented and owned, it shall certify this fact to the Interstate Commerce Commission, and the commission may, by order, suspend the operation of the provisions of this section with respect to the rates, fares, and charges for the transportation by rail of persons and property transported from, or to be transported, to such ports, for such length of time and under such terms and conditions as it may prescribe in such order, or in any order supplemental thereto. Such suspension of operation of the provisions of this section shall be terminated by order of the commission whenever the board is of the opinion that adequate shipping facilities by such vessels to such ports are afforded and shall so certify to the commission.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 32, after line 15, to insert:

SEC. 31. That the word "association," wherever used in this section, means any association, exchange, pool, combination, or other arrangement between or among persons.

That the words "marine insurance companies," wherever used in this section, means any persons authorized to write marine insurance or reinsurance under the laws of the United States or of a State, Territory, District, or possession thereof.

That nothing contained in the act entitled "An act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies," approved July 2, 1890, or in the act entitled "An act to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes," approved October 15, 1914, or in any other antitrust law, shall be construed as declaring to be illegal an association entered into by marine insurance companies for the following purposes only: (1) Reinsuring or otherwise distributing or dividing their risks on hulls, cargo, or other interests entering into our inland, coastwise, or foreign trade; and (2) transacting an insurance or reinsurance business in foreign countries, provided such association is not used in furthering unfair methods of competition against domestic competitors, or is otherwise unfairly restraining trade.

That every association, in order to obtain the benefits of this section, shall within 30 days after the enactment of this act or after its creation file with the board (1) a verified written statement setting forth the names and location of its officers, managers, and members, and, if a corporation, a copy of its certificate or articles of incorporation and by-laws, and, if unincorporated, a copy of its articles or contract of association, and on the 1st day of January of each year thereafter it shall make a like statement of the location of its offices or places of business and the names and addresses of all its officers, managers, and members and of all amendments to and changes in its articles or certificate of incorporation or in its articles or contract of association; (2) a true copy, or, if oral, a true and complete memorandum, of every agreement or arrangement, or modification or cancellation thereof, which may have been entered into for purposes of reinsurance or division of risks; and (3) such information as the board may require as to its organization, business conduct, practices, management, and relation to other associations or persons.

Whenever the board believes that an association or any agreement or arrangement made or act done by such association is furthering unfair methods of competition against domestic competitors, or otherwise unfairly restrains trade within the United States, or any Territory, District, or possession thereof, it shall summon such association, its officers, managers, and agents, or officers, managers, and agents of the marine insurance companies composing or affiliated with the association, and thereafter conduct an investigation into the facts. Upon investigation, if it shall conclude that the association or any act done by the association is furthering unfair methods of competition or is unfairly restraining trade, it may make to such association recommendations for the readjustment of its business. If such association fails to comply with such recommendations, the board shall refer its findings and recommendations to the Attorney General of the United States for such action thereon as he may deem proper.

For the purpose of enforcing the provisions of this section the board shall have all the powers, so far as applicable, given to it in the "Shipping act, 1916."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 35, after line 5, to insert:

SEC. 32. Any person hereafter furnishing repairs, supplies, or other necessaries, including towage and the use of dry dock or marine railway, to any vessel, whether foreign or domestic, upon the order of the owner of such vessel, or of a person by them or him authorized, shall have a maritime lien on the vessel which may be enforced by proceeding in rem, and it shall not be necessary to allege or prove that credit was given to the vessel; but such lien, and all other liens hereafter arising out of, or created by, any contract, express or implied, or for damages in the nature of demurrage not arising out of tort, except liens for wages of crew and of stevedores when employed by the owner, master, ship's husband, or agent of said vessel, general average and salvage, including contract salvage (which shall be known as preferred liens and rank among themselves as they now do under the maritime law) shall be subordinate to the lien of any mortgage duly recorded in the office of the collector of customs and noted on the certificate of registry, or of enrollment and license, as hereinafter provided, prior to the creating of such lien or liens, and any vessel sold under any such subordinate lien shall be sold subject to, and such sale shall not impair the lien of any such prior recorded and noted mortgage.

If any mortgaged vessel is sold under a decree in admiralty founded on a preferred lien as hereinabove defined, or on a maritime tort, such sale shall divest all liens as they now are divested by the maritime law of the United States on similar judicial sales, and the proceeds derived therefrom, after deducting marshal's fees, poundage, and other costs taxed by the court, shall be distributed to the parties and intervenors in such proceedings in accordance with the priorities of their respective liens on the vessel.

That no mortgage on the whole of any vessel of the United States of 200 gross tons and upward shall be valid against any person other than the mortgagor, his or its heirs, administrators, executors, successors, or assigns, and persons having actual notice thereof, or shall be subject to the provisions of this section, unless such mortgage is accompanied by the affidavits of the mortgagor and the mortgagee that it is made in good faith and without any design to hinder, delay, or defraud existing or future creditors of the mortgagor or lienors of the mortgaged vessel, and unless it is recorded and indorsements are made upon said vessel's certificates of registry or of enrollment and license, as hereinafter provided. Such mortgage, when in compliance with this section, shall constitute a lien on the vessel, and the mortgage indebtedness shall bear such rate of interest as shall be agreed by the parties.

Such mortgage shall not be given, or assigned, to anyone other than a person who is a citizen of the United States without the consent of the board.

If the parties to any mortgage on any vessel of the United States shall so stipulate therein, such mortgage shall not be subject to the provisions of this section, but shall remain subject to the provisions of sections 4192, 4193, and 4194 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

A mortgage within the purview of the preceding paragraphs of this section shall be recorded in the office of the collector of customs where the mortgaged vessel is permanently registered, or enrolled and licensed: Provided, That if a permanent certificate of registry, or of enrollment and license, has not been issued at the time of the execution of the mortgage, such mortgage shall be temporarily recorded in the office of the collector of customs where such vessel is then temporarily registered, or enrolled and licensed, and shall thereafter be rerecorded in the office of the collector of customs where and at the time such vessel is permanently registered, or enrolled and licensed. Such rerecording shall ipso facto discharge the temporary record.

Certificates of partial payments, and of final discharge, of the mortgage indebtedness, executed by the mortgagee, shall be filed by the mortgagor, and notices of claims of liens on any mortgaged vessels, and certificates of discharge thereof, may be filed by any lienor in the office of the collector of customs where any such mortgage is of record. Such aforesaid notice shall set forth the name and address of the lienor, the date of creation of the lien, the amount thereof, and briefly the nature of the lien. Said mortgages, certificates, and notices shall be acknowledged before a notary public or other officer authorized to take acknowledgment of deeds.

Collectors of customs in whose offices any such mortgages are recorded shall indorse upon the mortgaged vessel's certificate of registry, or of enrollment and license, a notation setting forth the place and date of the recording of such mortgage, the date of maturity thereof, the names of the mortgagor and mortgagee, the amount of secured indebtedness stated in the mortgage, and the amounts and dates of any partial payments stated in the recorded certificates thereof: Provided, That if such mortgage covers more than one vessel or other property, said indorsement shall also state the amount upon payment of which said vessel may be discharged from such mortgage.

Said indorsement shall thereafter be made by all collectors of customs upon each and every certificate of registry, or of enrollment and license, whether permanent or temporary, issued by them, under which said vessel shall operate, until the mortgage is fully discharged. If at the time of recording the mortgage or any certificates of partial payments or of final discharge the mortgaged vessel is not in a port of the United States, or is in a port of the United States without the district in which such instruments are recorded, then the collector of customs recording such instruments shall, upon request of the mortgagor or the mortgagee, or his or their assigns, notify, in writing or by telegram, the collector of customs for the district in which said vessel is then situated, or, if said vessel is not then in a United States port the collector of customs for the district in which said vessel thereafter first enters of the recording of such mortgage and of any certificates of partial payment, or of final discharge, and of the facts necessary to make the aforesaid indorsements, and upon receipt of such advices it shall be the duty of the collector of customs so notified forthwith to indorse such notations upon the vessel's certificate of registry, or of enrollment and license. No clearance shall be granted any mortgaged vessel unless such certificate bears such indorsement. The collector of customs recording such mortgage shall certify to and deliver one or more copies thereof to the mortgagor, who shall place and use due diligence to retain one copy on board such mortgaged vessel, and shall also use such diligence to cause such copy and the certificate of registry, or of enrollment and license, to be exhibited by the master to any person having business with such vessel, or the owner thereof, which may give rise to a maritime lien thereon.

Collectors of customs shall record all such aforesaid instruments, and the fact and date of the indorsement of any notation on certificates of registry, or of enrollment and license, in books kept for that purpose, which shall be indexed to show the name of the mortgaged vessel, the names of the parties to any such instrument, and the time of filing for record, and shall certify to the status of the mortgage record at any time upon the request of any person.

Collectors of customs shall receive for recording any instrument, or taking any acknowledgment, or giving any notice, or furnishing any certificate required by this section, a fee of $1; and for furnishing a certified copy of any recorded mortgage or of any certificate of partial payment, or of final discharge, or of any notice of claim of lien, or certificate of discharge thereof, a fee of $2; and shall be paid the cost of any telegram sent to other collectors.

The mortgagor shall disclose to the mortgagee in writing, prior to the execution of any mortgage, the existence of any obligation or liability constituting a lien on the vessel to be mortgaged then known to such mortgagor, and shall not incur any contractual obligation creating a lien upon the vessel without the consent of the mortgagee, other than for crews' and stevedores' wages when incurred as hereinafter provided, general average and salvage, including contract salvage, after the execution of any such mortgage and before the mortgagee shall have had a reasonable time to record the mortgage and to have the notation hereinbefore provided for indorsed upon the certificate of registry, or of enrollment and license. The mortgagor, and if the mortgagor be a corporation, the president, or other principal executive officer thereof who willfully violates any provision of this section shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and punishable for each offense by a fine not exceeding $1,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding two years, or both, in the discretion of the court, and the mortgage indebtedness shall thereupon immediately become due and payable at the election of the mortgagee. The failure of the master of any mortgaged vessel to exhibit the copy of any mortgage placed on board thereof, or the vessel's certificate of registry, or of enrollment and license, to any person entitled to examine the same, shall render his license subject to suspension or cancellation by the officers of the United States Steamboat-Inspection Service having jurisdiction thereof.

Any person who willfully and knowingly deposes falsely in the affidavit required by this section to accompany the mortgage shall be guilty of perjury and punishable by a fine not exceeding $5,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding five years, or both, in the discretion of the court.

If any person enters into any contract with the owner, master, ship's husband, or other agent of any vessels affected by such mortgage as may be filed, recorded, and noted as herein provided, and suffers pecuniary loss, damage, or injury by reason of any failure to make the notations or disclosures, or to communicate the information required by this section in respect of such mortgage, or by reason of any misrepresentations concerning the same or the bona fides of the mortgage, the party so injured may have and maintain, in any court obtaining by personal service jurisdiction of the person of the defendant, an action to recover damages compensatory for said loss, damage, or injury, such action to be brought against the person by whose act, omission, or negligence such loss, damage, or injury was caused. The failure of any collector of customs to record any of the aforesaid instruments filed for record, or to furnish certified copies thereof pursuant to request, or to furnish to other collectors of customs the information required to be furnished by this section, shall constitute actionable acts, omissions, and negligence. If any plaintiff in any such action recover judgment for damages, however small, it shall be the duty of the court entering judgment to allow and add to said judgment so entered a reasonable counsel fee, assessed by the court, which shall be a part of said judgment, and for the recovery of which plaintiff shall be entitled to all the remedies available for the enforcement of any judgment at law.

The district courts of the United States are hereby given jurisdiction, but not to the exclusion of the courts of the several States, Territories, Districts, and possessions of the United States, of any such action, irrespective of the amount in controversy or the citizenship or residence of the parties, whenever the action is begun by personal service on a defendant within the limits of the district in which such action is brought.

Jurisdiction is hereby vested in the district courts of the United States to impose the penalties hereinbefore provided and to foreclose any mortgage recorded and noted on the certificates of registry, or of enrollment and license, as hereinbefore provided, upon the maturity of any such mortgage or default in any of the terms or conditions thereof. Suit for such foreclosure may be commenced and maintained in a proceeding in equity in which the mortgaged vessel itself shall be named as the defendant in any district court of the United States in which the vessel is situated by attaching the vessel and by such publication of process of such district court, with citation to all the world, as the court shall order. Notice of the pendency of such suit shall also be given by serving a copy of said citation upon the master or other ranking officer or caretaker of the vessel, and also on the mortgagor or owner, and all lienors who shall have recorded, and not discharged of record, any notices of claims of liens, as heretofore provided, wherever they may be found within the United States, unless after search expressly found by the court to have been made diligently and satisfactorily by the plaintiff they can not be located therein. All persons having any liens on the mortgaged vessel must proceed upon the same in such suit, unless the vessel be released as hereinafter provided prior to intervention therefor, and shall be forever barred from thereafter proceeding thereon against such vessel.

In any such suit the court may appoint a receiver and, in its discretion, authorize his operation of the mortgaged vessel. Such receiver may be empowered and directed to take, seize, and possess himself of said vessel, notwithstanding that it is at the time in the possession or under the control of a person claiming a possessory or common-law lien, and such lien is hereby specifically subordinated to the lien of any prior mortgage recorded and noted in compliance with this section.

The mortgaged vessel shall be released on claim by the owner from said attachment, and thereby freed from the lien of the mortgage, and from any other liens for which intervention shall have been made prior to such release, but not otherwise, if the amounts of the mortgagee's and intervenor's claims, with interest and costs already accrued, are paid into court, or, if an approved stipulation, with surety, be filed with the court, in such form and amount as the court shall direct, for the payment of such final decrees with interest and costs, as may be made by the court, or by the appellate court, if an appeal intervenes.

If the mortgaged vessel is not released as provided in the preceding paragraph, the court, on satisfactory proof that the vessel is in danger of loss or depreciation, may, and on entry of a decree of foreclosure against the defendant vessel shall, cause the vessel to be sold by the United States marshal for the district in which such suit is brought under a writ of venditioni exponas, after such notice thereof as the court shall order, to any person who is a citizen of the United States, to answer any judgment that has been or may be entered in such suit. On confirmation by the court of any such sale all liens on the vessel shall terminate and shall thereafter attach only to the proceeds derived from such sale in accordance with the respective priorities which the liens had on the vessel, and the purchaser of the vessel shall acquire indefensible title thereto, free and clear of all liens, as against all the world; and the said United States marshal making such sale, or his duly qualified successor, shall, on order by the court, execute a good and sufficient bill of sale to said property, vesting such title thereto in the purchaser. The proceeds derived from such sale, after deduction of expenses allowed and costs taxed by the court, shall be applied to the payment of such judgment as may be entered in such suit and of any other liens on the mortgaged vessel for which intervention shall have been made, all in accordance with their respective priorities; and the residue, if any, shall be paid to the mortgagor or the owner, or other parties intervening, his or their heirs, executors, administrators, successors, or assigns, as their interests shall appear.

Proceedings in foreclosure under this section shall conform as nearly as may be to proceedings in rem in admiralty.

The mortgagee may join the mortgagor as a party defendant in such suit by serving the mortgagor personally with process of such district court wherever the mortgagor may be found within the United States, and if so prayed, judgment against the mortgagor may also be entered in such suit for the amount of the mortgage indebtedness, or for any deficiency in the full payment of the mortgage indebtedness remaining unpaid after the application thereto of all or any of the proceeds derived from the sale of the mortgaged vessel as hereinbefore provided.

Nothing contained in this section shall be construed to prejudice the mortgagee from proceedings in personam against the mortgagor in any other court for said mortgage indebtedness or for any deficiency in the full payment thereof.

If the mortgaged vessel is not within the United States at the time the right to foreclose the mortgage lien accrues, the mortgagee may maintain an action in personam for the mortgage indebtedness against the mortgagor in the district court of the United States within the jurisdiction of which the mortgagor resides, by serving process of such court personally upon the mortgagor wherever found within the United States. In such suit the mortgagee shall have the right to have the validity of the mortgage lien on the mortgaged vessel adjudicated.

Nothing contained in this section shall be deemed to change the priority fixed by the maritime law of the United States as between preferred liens and liens arising from maritime torts.

The following persons shall be presumed to have authority from the owner or owners to procure repairs, supplies, and other necessaries for the vessel: The managing owner, ship's husband, master, or any person to whom the management of the vessel at the port of supply is intrusted. No person tortiously or unlawfully in possession or charge of a vessel shall have authority to bind the vessel.

The officers and agents of a vessel specified in the preceding paragraph of this section shall be taken to include such officers and agents when appointed by a charterer, by an owner pro hac vice, or by an agreed purchaser in possession of the vessel, but nothing in this section shall be construed to confer a lien when the furnisher knew, or by exercise of reasonable diligence could have ascertained, that because of the terms of a charter party, agreement for sale of the vessel, or for any other reason, the person ordering the repairs, supplies, or other necessaries was without authority to bind the vessel therefor.

This section shall supersede the provisions of all State statutes conferring liens on vessels, in so far as the same purport to create rights of action to be enforced by proceedings in rem against vessels for repairs, supplies, and other necessaries.

The lien of any mortgage may be waived, or subordinated to any other lien, by the mortgagee, or by any trustee under the mortgage if, and to the amount, authorized by the mortgage.

This section shall not apply to any existing mortgage, or to any mortgage hereafter placed on any vessel now under an existing mortgage, unless and until the mortgagor and mortgagee of any such existing mortgage mutually agree in writing to be bound by the provisions hereof and comply therewith.

As used in this section, the word "mortgagee" shall include a trustee under any mortgage subject to the provisions of this section.

The Secretary of Commerce is hereby authorized and directed to furnish collectors of customs with all necessary books and records, and with certificates of registry and of enrollment and license in such form as shall provide for the making of the hereinbefore required indorsements on the back thereof.

The act entitled "An act relating to liens on vessels for repairs, supplies, or other necessaries," approved June 23, 1910, and all other acts or parts of acts are hereby repealed so far as they are inconsistent with the provisions of this section.

Mr. KING. I ask the chairman of the committee whether the fees received by the collector, provided on page 40, lines 11 to 18, are paid into the Treasury, or are they personal?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I take it that they would be paid into the Treasury. There is nothing here which authorizes the collector to keep them, and I take it that under the law he gets a fixed salary.

Mr. KING. I am aware of that fact, but I was wondering if the collector would not construe this language as entitling him to those fees in addition to his compensation.

Mr. JONES of Washington. No; I do not think so. If the Senator has any doubt about it, I would be glad to have an amendment offered to prevent it; but there was not any intention to do that. My recollection is that we have a general law that all fees must go into the Treasury, but I am not certain of that. I am sure that the collector would not get them under this provision.

Mr. KING. Let me suggest to the Senator that we add the following language, on page 40, line 18, after the word "Collectors":

All fees so collected shall be paid by the collector into the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I have no objection to that amendment at all and would be glad to have it made. Probably the Secretary had better state the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The READING CLERK. On page 40, line 18, after the word "collectors" and the period, add the following:

All fees so collected shall be paid by the collector into the Treasury of the United States.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KING. I invite the attention of the chairman of the committee to lines 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, and 10, on page 43. I am not quite clear as to what is contemplated by that provision:

The district courts of the United States are hereby given jurisdiction, but not to the exclusion of the courts of the several States, Territories, Districts, and possessions of the United States, of any such action, irrespective of the amount in controversy or the citizenship or residence of the parties, whenever the action is begun by personal service on a defendant within the limits of the district in which such action is brought.

Does that mean that in the event there is not "personal service" of process, the courts described in the lines which I have just read would have no jurisdiction over the person or over the subject matter of the action? I can understand that they might have no jurisdiction to render a personal judgment against the defendant without personal service, but to deny them jurisdiction of the subject matter of the action unless there was personal service, it seems to me, would be a rather unique and unusual proceeding. An action in rem might lie against the property, or it might by attachment be brought into the court. It is possible that I do not fully understand the nature of the action which is authorized to be brought, and to which this section refers.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I will say to the Senator that this deals very largely with admiralty matters, and I am not familiar with admiralty practice. This provision was gone over several times by the admiralty lawyers not only of the Shipping Board but from different parts of the country. They went into it with very great care, and this is the final draft of their deliberations.

The point that the Senator makes had not occurred to me. It is very likely that, under the system of admiralty practice, it is very plain as to what it means. It occurs to me in reading it over, after the Senator has called special attention to it, that it gives to the district courts of the United States jurisdiction whenever personal service can be had in the action mentioned in the preceding paragraph, not to the exclusion, of course, of the local courts; but when personal service can not be had, it leaves the jurisdiction as it now is, I assume, exclusively in the local courts.

It is a matter we will look into very carefully in conference, I will say to the Senator, and I shall call it to the attention of the attorneys whom we expect to have there, so as to be sure that we have this as nearly right as possible. I do not know whether that course will be very satisfactory to the Senator, but it is the best course that I can suggest to him.

Mr. KING. I shall not ask at this time that the amendment shall be disagreed to, but upon further examination of the matter if I find that it narrows too much the jurisdiction of the court and that it ought to be amended, I shall ask for a reconsideration of the vote.

Mr. JONES of Washington. There will be no objection to that, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. KING. I ask the attention of the chairman of the committee to the paragraph ending on line 12, page 48:

This section shall supersede the provisions of all State statutes conferring liens on vessels, in so far as the same purport to create rights of action to be enforced by proceedings in rem against vessels for repairs, supplies, and other necessaries.

Is that limited to vessels of the Government of the United States?

Mr. JONES of Washington. No; it is not limited to vessels of the United States.

Mr. KING. I am not sufficiently acquainted with admiralty procedure to determine whether that provision is wise and proper. It occurs to one who is not familiar with that practice that it is rather unusual to supersede State statutes conferring liens on vessels, and, of course, to that extent depriving persons of any rights which the States might give for the violation of a contract or for the prosecution of remedies for the infractions of contracts.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Let me say to the Senator that it is the purpose of the section to give a mortgagee a preference right to enforce his mortgage as against all claims except maritime liens for wages and salvage and average and things of that kind, which can not be protected against by insurance or other methods of maritime law, provided he has had his mortgage recorded and due notice is given of it. In other words, a man who furnishes repairs after a mortgage is made can not come in ahead of that mortgage. That is the real purpose of the entire amendment.

If we can not do that, then there is no use for the provision at all. The main purpose of it is to encourage investments in shipping upon the part of our people. Without any security for his money, a man is not going to make a loan on a ship.

I will say frankly to the Senator that there is a legal controversy as to our constitutional right to take out of the State courts this remedy for enforcing these claims and put it into the United States courts. The lawyers are divided over it. It is contended, on the one hand, that under the maritime declaration in the Constitution we have the power to do it. It is contended, on the other hand, that we have not the power. That is a controversy that we can not settle here. There is room for doubt, and no one can settle that proposition except the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. KING. As I stated, I am so unfamiliar with maritime law that my opinion respecting the matter would be of little value; but it does seem to me that it is striking too much at the right of contract and the rights and powers of the States to say that contracts entered into between individuals may not be enforced in the State courts and that these contracts may be superseded by the legislation of Congress.

Mr. JONES of Washington. If the bill becomes a law and is held valid, then of course the contracts will be made subject to its provisions and it would tend to impair anything done thereafter. It does not impair existing property rights or claims or remedies, but simply relates to the future, and of course everybody would have notice of the law. The man who wants to make repairs on a vessel can very easily see that he is amply secured.

I will say to the Senator that there was quite a controversy by the repair men as to whether or not this provision should be incorporated in the bill. There have been extensive hearings, and it is my opinion that generally the repair men are satisfied with the provision. They can protect themselves. A man does not need to make repairs on a vessel until he is amply secured in one form or another. If the repairs to the vessel should take the place of a prior mortgage in every case, we would never have any mortgages put on vessels and it would defeat the very object of the amendment.

Mr. KING. It seems to me, if the Senator will pardon me, that it is a precedent which may in the end prove not only disadvantageous to all forms of business but dangerous to the people. For instance, if, by act of Congress, we may supersede the right of individuals to contract with respect to vessels and liens upon vessels, and can overrule and set aside State laws relating to matters of contract between individuals, asserting the right so to do under the interstate commerce power of the Federal Government or some other provision——

Mr. JONES of Washington. We are not trying to do it under that power. This is under the maritime declaration of the Constitution.

Mr. KING. Or some other provision of the Constitution, soon we may have persons insisting that wherever there is any work performed in or about personal property employed in interstate commerce, for instance, engines or cars, there should be congressional legislation to control or effect the contractual rights and obligations between individuals respecting property employed in interstate commerce.

I do not just at present see all the lengths to which this precedent might lead us, but it would seem that if the right of contract between individuals, residents of and domiciled in a State respecting property in the harbors or upon the docks or wharves of a city of the State, may be interfered with by act of Congress or denied enforcement, and if State laws dealing with subjects clearly within the police power of the State may be nullified or superseded by such Federal action, we are going to dangerous lengths.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I wish to call the Senator's attention to the peculiar condition that we are trying to meet. Ships are different from railroad trains or engines. Ships go to all parts of the world, while in this country your engines stay here within the jurisdiction of the courts, and often locally your ship goes anywhere in the world.

If the owner of a ship should come to the Senator to borrow money and say, "I will give you a mortgage on my ship," but you know that no matter if you have a mortgage on that ship, any subsequent claim for repairs anywhere will become superior to that mortgage, the Senator would not loan the money. This is really to preserve a deliberate contract made between the owner of a vessel and some man from whom he borrows his money. That is the purpose of the section. As I have said, the repair man can fully protect himself. He can say, "I see you have a mortgage on this vessel, and I will not make the repairs until I have ample security from you." Under this proposed law, he can still hold the vessel for his claim, but, of course, it is subordinate to a prior mortgage.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I have been engaged in a committee and came into the Chamber in the midst of this discussion; but I am interested in it. At the present time, under the law, as I understand, if a man has a mortgage upon a vessel, and it is necessary to repair the vessel, the lien for the repairs takes precedence over the mortgage. Is it proposed to change that rule by this bill?

Mr. JONES of Washington. It is. I will state to the Senator that every repair man who came before the Committee on Commerce was in favor of the proposition.

Mr. REED. I should want something more than the opinion of the repair men who came here before I would change a custom.

Mr. JONES of Washington. But that is not all. I will say to the Senator other reasons were given.

Mr. REED. I should want more than their opinion; I should want a good reason given before I would vote to change a custom that has existed for, I suppose, a thousand years.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Oh, no, Mr. President. That custom, in a way, may have existed, but we enacted a law in 1910 making liens for repairs, supplies, and other necessaries superior to mortgages.

Mr. REED. Making such liens superior?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes; in 1910.

Mr. REED. They have always been superior under general maritime law, have they not?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think so.

Mr. REED. It is true to-day that if a man mortgages a house and afterwards a mechanic does work upon that house, the mechanic's lien takes precedence of the mortgage, is it not?

Mr. JONES of Washington. It is true in some States, anyway, though it may not be true in all.

Mr. REED. Well, it is true in a great many States?

Mr. JONES of Washington. It is true in the State of Washington; I know that.

Mr. REED. It is a very sound proposition, too, is it not?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes; I think so.

Mr. REED. Why is it not a sound proposition with reference to vessels?

Mr. JONES of Washington. A vessel is an entirely different kind of property from a house and is used in an entirely different way.

Mr. REED. But the principle that is back of the mechanic's lien law does not depend upon the fact that the property happens to be a house; it depends upon the fact that the man who improves or betters the property should be paid in preference to a man who has a prior lien, because when the lien was taken it was not taken upon the property with the improvement, but the improvement has been since added, and therefore it is but equitable that the man who added the improvement should be preferred over the man who had a lien which was put on the property before the improvement was added to it. I want to know why that principle does not apply to a vessel?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I want to tell the Senator what the purpose of this provision is. As I stated to the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] a while ago, this is an admiralty proposition; and I frankly say that I know, I might say, nothing about admiralty law; I have had no experience or connection with it. The situation that confronts us with reference to a merchant marine is just this: We should like to have our people interested in ships and in ship securities. It is the opinion of many of our business men and many of our shipping people that we shall not be able to maintain an American merchant marine unless we do get our people interested in shipping securities and in shipping. They say that under the present law people will not loan money upon ships, because they have practically no security; that their mortgages would be eaten up by repairs made in various ways after the mortgages are put on. They say that something of this kind is absolutely necessary. This provision has been considered by the business men and the business organizations of the country; it has been gone over again and again by those who are familiar with admiralty practice and admiralty claims, liens, and so forth. The chairman of the Shipping Board, Mr. Payne, urges this as one of the essentials for the building up the American merchant marine.

Mr. REED. He also urges the selling of our ships.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes; that is true. Of course, we may not agree with Mr. Payne in everything that he urges, but this provision is in harmony with the business sentiment both of the commercial people and those who will be affected by the bill. Mr. Homer Ferguson, of the Newport News Shipbuilding Co., urged it very strongly. He said, "Although we do a great deal of repair work we can protect ourselves"; and the repair people generally say that they can protect themselves; that they do not anticipate any special trouble about it. That is the purpose of this provision.

As I have said, I am not familiar with admiralty practice, admiralty law, and so on, and therefore can not enter into any argument with anyone with reference to it; but all of these people seem to think that by reason of vessels being a peculiar character of the property, and because of the peculiar use to which they are put and the situation that is presented, we must enact a different provision from that which has heretofore been the law; that the provision, as found in the bill, fully protects all the interests that are affected by it; and that it will tend to interest our people in shipping securities and in shipping property. Briefly, that is the situation that confronted the committee; and with the testimony that we had, which was as strong as it could be, from practically every interest, we thought this was a very wise provision to insert in the bill.

Mr. REED. What is the provision of the law of England with reference to priorities of claims as between a mortgagee and a repair man?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I do not think they have a provision of this kind in their law. I think theirs is the old common law.

Mr. REED. And it would appear from that that there is no difficulty over there in getting capital for ships?

Mr. JONES of Washington. They have encouraged their shipping in a great many ways. Of course, they have it already built up, while we are trying to build ours up. That is what we are trying to do, and this is one thing that the different interests think will help to do it.

If we can get something in advance of Great Britain, I hope we can do so, and we believe that this is a very necessary and very vital provision. That is the situation as it confronted the committee.

As I have said, I can not argue the proposition as to the questions of law involved, and that sort of thing; I do not pretend to be particularly familiar with them and will not argue them; but the situation I have described is the one we desire to meet, and we believe that this provision will do it.

Mr. REED. The question is whether it does meet it, and on that we should pass.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Certainly.

Mr. REED. Now, it appears from the Senator's information that Great Britain, which is the largest maritime power in the world, acts under the rule that repairs take precedence over mortgage liens, and they have built up a great fleet under that system.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. NELSON. The material changes this bill makes in connection with the matter now under discussion are found in section 32. I will quote from that section and briefly refer to it:

> Any person hereafter furnishing repairs, supplies, or other necessaries, including towage and the use of dry-dock or marine railway, to any vessel, whether foreign or domestic, upon the order of the owner of such vessel, or of a person by them or him authorized, shall have a maritime lien on the vessel.

That is the practice under general maritime law. Under that law there has always been such a lien for "furnishing repairs, supplies, or other necessaries, including towage," and so forth. While in such cases this bill gives a lien on the vessel, it subordinates that lien to any mortgage of record before it. The only liens that take precedence of a mortgage are those which are specified further along in the section. After reciting the liens to which I have referred, the bill continues:

> But such lien, and all other liens hereafter arising out of, or created by, any contract, express or implied, or for damages in the nature of demurrage not arising out of tort, except—> liens for wages of crew and of stevedores when employed by the owner, master, ship's husband, or agent of said vessel, general average and salvage, including contract salvage (which shall be known as preferred liens and rank among themselves as they now do under the maritime law).

Those are the only maritime liens that are given a priority over a mortgage. The great change that is effected by this bill in respect to liens is in the first class to which I have referred. Under general maritime law the liens in that class have always been given a priority in order, amongst other reasons, that a ship reaching a foreign port in a disabled condition may be put into a dry dock or have repairs made or purchase supplies to enable her to proceed on her journey and not be stalled and tied up for good. In such a case the master has a right to incur such expenses, and they were always subject to a first maritime lien.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. The purpose was to insure the preservation of the property upon which the mortgagee had loaned his money.

Mr. NELSON. Yes. Of course, the wages of sailors were included and were given a priority. So it is in the matter of general average and salvage which arise out of wrecks. The principle of general average comes into play where goods are jettisoned, as it is called in maritime law. When in order to save the ship and the lives of the crew any part of the freight is thrown overboard or jettisoned, in computing the damages there is a general average; that is, although the freight on board of a ship may consist of the goods of A, B, C, and D, and the goods jettisoned may be only those belonging to A, the goods of B, C, and D being left intact, yet in admiralty law, under the law of general average, the loss on account of the goods jettisoned is averaged so as to be borne not only by the owner whose goods were lost but also by the other parties whose goods are saved, because the jettisoning of the goods was for the safety of the ship and the safety of the remainder of the freight.

As I have said, this class of maritime liens, namely, liens for the wages of the crew and stevedores employed by the owner, general average and salvage are not subordinated to a mortgage. Salvage, as Senators know, is the saving of a ship, and contract salvage is where a bargain is made for salvage. All these are preferred liens and come prior to the mortgage. According to this bill the only liens subordinated to a mortgage are those relating to material furnished and to repairs and supplies.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. NELSON. Certainly.

Mr. JONES of Washington. This does not pretend, either, to affect those vessels in the ports of a foreign country. The matter would be governed there by the laws of the country. If a vessel is disabled, for instance, in Liverpool, the matter of the repairman's lien or claim will depend upon the laws of England, and it will not be affected at all by this bill. If the vessel has to be repaired and the law of England gives a repairman a claim superior to the mortgage, he can enforce it.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, this is all I care to say. I simply made this statement to call the attention of the Senator from Missouri to what I understood was the exception made in the bill.

Mr. REED. I am very much obliged to the Senator from Minnesota. I understood that it is the intention to have an executive session at this time.

Mr. JONES of Washington. If the Senator would like this to go over at this time, I shall have no objection.

Mr. REED. I should like to have that done. There are several amendments to the bill that have been suggested to me that I have not yet had time to analyze; but I understood that we were going into executive session at 4.30 o'clock, and I should be glad if the bill could be laid aside now for that purpose.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I was going to say that there are two or three sections just following this to which I do not think there will be any objection at all, with reference to seamen. If those could be read, then if any Senator wants them to go over, of course, I shall be glad to have it done, and to allow this section to go over.

Mr. REED. I should prefer that these sections be not passed on to-night. I do not like to be asking for delay on this bill. I know how anxious the Senator is to get it through. It is an important bill. Our minds have been engrossed with many matters; and, so far as I am concerned, I have been working on this paper committee, spending every spare moment on it that I had. I do not believe we would gain time by trying to get through with these matters to-night.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I want to say to the Senator that I appreciate that he has been busy. I know that he has not been able to attend these hearings and attend the consideration of the bill. Many other Senators are in the same situation with reference to various bills, and I want to utilize all the time that is possible in connection with this measure.

I want to say this to the Senator, though I do not ask him to take it as governing his action with reference to the bill: There is absolutely no division in the committee with reference to the bill as a whole, and the minority members of the committee have been just as careful and just as earnest in framing the bill as the majority members. We have had absolutely no division on this section and many of the other sections of the bill. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL], the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], and the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] are members of the committee and of the subcommittee of nine. While the Senator from Florida has been away, the other members of the committee have been here, and we have been in hearty accord with reference to the various provisions of the bill. I do not know of a single minority member who is opposed to any section of the bill.

I just state that so that the Senator will understand the result of the deliberations of the subcommittee and the full committee that attended to the hearings. As I say, I do not ask the Senator to take it as controlling his judgment.

Mr. REED. The political division of the committee would not affect me in the slightest. I know that the Senator in charge of the bill and the Senator from Minnesota would approach a question of this kind just as I hope I would—that is, in a disinterested way and an endeavor to get the best possible results.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That is what I wanted to convey to the Senator—that that is the way all the members of the committee considered this question. There was not any party consideration of any kind or character in connection with it.

Mr. SMOOT (to Mr. JONES of Washington). I should like to have an executive session at this time.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator from Missouri would like to have this section go over. We are going to have an executive session now, and that will be satisfactory.

Mr. REED. Very well.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 15 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

RECESS.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock noon to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Friday, May 14, 1920, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, May 13, 1920.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, in obedience to Thy behests, in the eternal evolution of things, help us as individuals to lay hold of the raw material with which Thou hast abundantly blessed us and develop from within the perfect man, as illustrated in the historic Christ, set forth in His Gospel, until we all come unto the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ and thus—

Work out our own salvation with fear and trembling:

For it is God which worketh in us both to will and to do of His good pleasure.

For Thine is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory, forever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

A message, in writing, from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatitves, by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Dudley, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2789) for the consolidation of forest lands in the Sierra National Forest, Calif., and for other purposes; had asked a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon; and had appointed Mr. SMOOT, Mr. FALL, and Mr. PHELAN as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13555) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, and for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and for other purposes.

WATER TRANSPORTATION.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for not exceeding 15 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to address the House for not exceeding 15 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the gentleman from North Carolina is recognized. [Applause.]

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit some remarks upon the question of transportation and the relation of water transportation and waterways to the subject. It has been known of all for some years that the present facilities for distribution were not adequate to the needs of the country. The railroads admit that they are unable to cope with the existing demands for transportation. That has been demonstrated at different times for a number of years. We were confronted with it during the period of the war; it exists to-day. I find in the morning papers a very impressive communication sent out by the Associated Press, pointing out the need for additional cars, the congestion of cars, the conditions at railroad terminals. And the cry from the producers, whether of raw products or of manufactured articles, all over the country for relief is distressing. No one can read this article in the morning papers without being impressed with the serious condition which confronts the country. If additional facilities for transportation are to be provided, where shall the country turn? We may get some relief from the highways. There is a very decided movement all over the country on the part of the States and localities; there is a disposition on the part of Congress, as representatives of the Federal Government, to make larger expenditures in the construction of hard-surface roads, and with the extension of these roads and the multiplication of the motor trucks some relief for short-distance traffic will be afforded. But the highways will be far from giving an adequate solution.

The only instrumentalities to which the country can turn is the waterways. There has been throughout the country during recent years a revolution of public sentiment toward the more extended use of the waterways for transportation. And there is in the minds of serious-minded men everywhere, particularly, upon the part of producers, a disposition to consider intelligently some effective means for an enlarged use of the waterways. That was exhibited by Congress in the recent railroad-control bill. There were some features in that bill which were intended primarily to promote and later advance the interest of water transportation. The attention of the country has been called to some of the essentials for water transportation to which I may very briefly advert. We must have the same interchange of traffic between the water lines and rail lines as has existed for years between different rail lines. The law heretofore has been to some extent inadequate, and that inadequacy has been emphasized by the inaction of the Interstate Commerce Commission in utilizing the law that was upon the statute books authorizing interchange of traffic between water lines and rail lines. The country recognizes that in order to afford interchange of traffic there must be at every city and port and town contiguous to a harbor or navigable waterway an adequate water terminal.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMALL. In just a minute I will yield.

Up to the present time Congress has not assumed the function of appropriating money for the construction of water terminals. What it will ultimately do is an open question, but for the present, at least, it is understood that these water terminals must be provided by the municipalities; that they must be owned and regulated in the interest of the public, and it is recognized that without these water terminals this interchange of traffic between water lines and rail lines will be impossible.

Now I yield to the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I want to say to the gentleman, in line with his statement now and previous statements made by him, that Baltimore is about to issue bonds for that purpose to the extent of $50,000,000, in order to aid the Government in its enterprise of water transportation.

Mr. SMALL. I am glad to give the gentleman an opportunity to advertise the Monumental City. Baltimore is doing well, better than it has in the past, and let us hope the future will demonstrate its good faith in providing these municipal water terminals so as to facilitate this interchange of traffic.

One objection heretofore to appropriations by Congress to rivers and harbors has come from the interior sections, who contended they were not benefited by the improvement of our navigable rivers. To a certain extent that criticism has been justified, because the improvement of the waterways has simply heretofore resulted in their use for local traffic. But with interchange of traffic the interior sections will get the benefit of the cheapened movement by water in so far as it can be carried by water and thence by transfer to the rail lines.

Mr. CLEARY. Will the gentleman yield for just a moment?

Mr. SMALL. I yield.

Mr. CLEARY. I presume the gentleman will not place the New York Barge Canal in his category of simply local traffic, because it carries into the center of the Continent, and the Erie Canal has done so during my whole life.

Mr. SMALL. My colleague on the River and Harbor Committee is entirely correct. The Erie Barge Canal is an instrumentality for interstate traffic and is of national importance.

Now, I repeat, that the sentiment of the country, including that great section, the Empire of the Middle West, has been drawn toward the necessity of the increased use of water transportation and its coordination with the railroads of the country. I have here before me a letter from Mr. M. C. Garber, editor of the Madison Courier, of Indiana, who I understand is a distinguished Republican and that his paper has a large circulation in that State. He incloses a clipping from a Cincinnati paper describing the recent movement of a large number of automobiles from Detroit by lake to Chicago and thence down the Desplaines and Illinois Rivers to the Mississippi, and thence to St. Louis.

And the same item refers to a further movement of automobiles to Memphis and other points on the lower Mississippi. During the active existence of the United States Railroad Administration, under authority of law there was authorized the purchase and construction of barges and towboats for operation on the lower Mississippi between St. Louis and New Orleans. Similarly, barges and towboats were authorized for the upper Mississippi between St. Louis and St. Paul and Minneapolis, and on other rivers of the Mississippi Valley efforts are being directed toward multiplying boats for the purpose of water transportation. I believe that these experiments will result in a successful demonstration, and that not only the great Mississippi but its tributaries will be used more largely in the future, not only for local transportation but for interchange of traffic with the railroads.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we can not have water transportation unless we improve and maintain our waterways. That admittedly is the exclusive function of Congress. What has been the attitude of Congress toward the improvement of rivers and harbors?

Beginning with 1910 the Rivers and Harbors Committee, under the guidance of its distinguished chairman, Mr. Alexander, of New York, initiated annual river and harbor bills. There has been no hiatus in the continuity of these annual bills since that time. A Democratic House was elected in 1910, and during the rule of that party in this House we had annual bills, and I have before me here a statement, prepared by the clerk to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, giving the amount of the appropriations, the continuing contracts, the number of new projects, and the initial appropriation for each carried in every one of those bills. Under leave of the House, I append this table.

I would like to remind gentlemen that, so far as I know, during all the period of river and harbor legislation during these 20 years since I have been a Member of the House there has been no partisanship and little of sectionalism in river and harbor bills. The appropriations for this public purpose do not lend themselves to partisan consideration, and ought not to.

Now, this was a regular session for the enactment of the annual river and harbor bill. I submit to the House that this activity is just as important to the country, certainly just as important to-day, as any other activity of the Government, and this annual bill is entitled to the same careful consideration of Congress as the maintenance of any other activity by the Government.

The Committee on Rivers and Harbors at the beginning of this session began the preparation of a river and harbor bill. As they were proceeding they would have reported a bill, say, carrying $5,000,000 for maintenance, and appropriations for the further improvement of about 49 projects, totaling about $19,500,000, which, with the appropriation for emergencies, surveys, and contingencies would have made a bill not exceeding $25,000,000. I was informed that the majority leader directed or suggested that the committee report a bill carrying a lump sum of $12,000,000. Their action was predicated upon the necessity of economy. Certainly, as one Member, I am not criticizing the policy of economy in this session of Congress; but such a bill as the committee would have reported, and to which I have adverted briefly, would have represented the very highest degree of economy, an irreducible minimum in the appropriations which were necessary, in the opinion of the Chief of Engineers, for the maintenance of the completed projects and for further work upon projects which had been adopted but not completed.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from North Carolina yield to the gentleman from Wyoming?

Mr. SMALL. Certainly.

Mr. MONDELL. I did not quite catch what the gentleman said about the action directing or attempting to direct the action of the committee. What was the gentleman's statement?

Mr. SMALL. To this effect, that the committee were informed that word had come from the majority leader that we should report a bill carrying a lump sum of $12,000,000, and that such action was necessary in the interest of economy.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have two minutes more.

Mr. SMALL. Will the gentleman make it six minutes more?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think he should recognize a unanimous request for six minutes more.

Mr. MONDELL. I make it two minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from North Carolina may proceed for two minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. I understood the gentleman to use the word "directed." If the gentleman will allow me, I will say this: There was no direction to anyone, by myself or anyone else, so far as I know. There were a number of conferences among gentlemen relative to the river and harbor bill, and a general agreement reached as to the scope of the bill; but that was an agreement reached by the majority members, and not under any coercion, and not at anyone's command, and not, strictly speaking, at anyone's suggestion outside of the committee.

Mr. CLEARY. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. SMALL. I can not yield.

Mr. CLEARY. I was going to ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for six minutes. I rarely ask the House for anything.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is out of order. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL] has the floor.

Mr. CLEARY. I ask that the gentleman may proceed for six minutes.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not recognize the gentleman from New York for that purpose. The gentleman from North Carolina has the floor.

Mr. SMALL. Without asking for additional time, Mr. Speaker, I wish to add this brief statement. It was not my purpose to make an offensive statement either about the majority leader or the majority action. I only wish to say this, without disparaging the motive of the gentleman from Wyoming or anyone. The gentlemen in the majority will have difficulty in convincing the country of their friendly attitude toward river and harbor legislation at this session. The bill passed the House on January 22, and passed the Senate on April 26, but up to this time the bill has not been sent to conference. It is said that failure to act has been due to the illness of the chairman of the committee, whose presence is desired by the majority leader to serve as House conferee. I am not disparaging the attitude of the gentleman from Wyoming with reference to the matter, except to say that this delay jeopardizes the passage of the bill at this session, and I wish the country to know that if the bill should fail, the fault will lie at the door of the majority. The way to get a river and harbor bill is to send it to conference and endeavor to reconcile the differences between the two Houses.

I hope the bill will not fail. The interests of the country demand that we should have this annual bill. I am not at this moment urging that the bill contain any particular sum. The bill as passed by the House carried an appropriation of $12,000,000. The Senate increased the same to $24,000,000. Conferees should be appointed. The House must act first. Let them try to reconcile the differences between the two bodies. We ought to have a river and harbor bill in order to preserve the continuity of the bill and maintain the activities of the Government in the improvement of rivers and harbors and the furnishing of additional instrumentalities of transportation. [Applause.]

The time granted to me expired before I could complete my remarks and, under leave of the House, I will extend same briefly. I do not intend in anything I have said to impute the slightest blame to Hon. CHARLES A. KENNEDY, the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. He has been ill at his home since the bill passed the House last January. If he was here and physically able to discharge his duties he would and should be appointed chairman of the House conferees. In response to my inquiry he wired me on May 1 that he could not come to Washington and serve as conferee. I so notified the majority leader. Subsequently the majority leader informed me that he expects Mr. KENNEDY to return within one or two weeks. I can not believe that the chairman wishes to imperil the passage of the bill at this session. I am on the most cordial terms with the chairman and he possesses the confidence and respect of the entire committee. I deplore his illness and earnestly hope for his early recovery. However, he has not requested that the appointment of conferees be delayed on account of his unavoidable absence. He has long served with distinction as a member of this body and as member and chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. He is loyal to every duty and he would not knowingly delay or jeopardize the river and harbor bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia is recognized for five minutes. [Applause.]

BAPTISTS.

Mr. LARSEN. Mr. Speaker, I deeply appreciate the reconsideration of the gentleman who at first interposed objection to my proposed remarks. I hope I shall not consume more than the few minutes allotted me.

As perhaps you all know, the Southern Baptist Convention is now in session in this city. A very magnificent tribute was paid to the Baptist denomination by the Washington Herald yesterday morning, in a few lines, which I would like to read. At the conclusion of the reading I desire to speak briefly on a resolution which I will offer. The Washington Herald editorial of yesterday is as follows:

SOUTHERN BAPTISTS CONFER.

Up from the South a small army of Baptists have come to town to plan another year's campaign of one of the largest subdivisions of the Protestant forces of the Nation.

They are not folk with many theological vagaries "made in Germany." They have a limited assortment of "isms" tagged on to their Christian program. Clericalism and ecclesiasticism do not get much sympathy from these folk with Bunyan and Roger Williams as prototypes. They stress independence in their polity and direct Divine guidance in their faith; and their institutional discipline and social condemnation are severe on indulgence in things of the flesh.

The older American political and ethical ideals they will still fight for as voters and lawmakers, and they still rank Jesus as a safer guide to conduct than Plato, Goethe, or Lenin.

That is a very timely and, in my opinion, deserving compliment. I ask the Clerk at this time to read the resolution which I wish to offer.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas more than 8,000 messengers of the Southern Baptist denomination are now assembled in convention in this city; and

Whereas said denomination, with about 7,000,000 active members in the United States, claims to constitute the greatest single Protestant religious organization in this Nation; and

Whereas said denomination, with devotion to democratic institutions, expresses belief in religious liberty and complete separation of church from state matters: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we extend to said messengers a hearty welcome to the Nation's Capital and a cordial invitation while here to visit the legislative galleries and elsewhere about the Capitol Building and Grounds.

[Applause.]

Mr. LARSEN. The Constitution of the United States as originally adopted by our forefathers was, in my judgment, one of the greatest documents ever invented by the genius of man. But, great as it was, who at this time would say that it would have been complete, or that it would have given to the Nation that marvelous growth and development which it has without the adoption of the first amendment thereto? Let us read. Some of us, I fear, need to study it a little more in the future than we have in the past. I am sure all would profit by keeping it before us.

Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof, or abridging the freedom of speech or the press or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

May I be permitted to remind you that the Baptist denomination was largely instrumental in securing the adoption of that amendment? For proof of this statement we have such distinguished authority as Gen. Madison, the brother of President Madison, I believe. The Baptist work in that one respect alone entitles it to the everlasting gratitude not only of the people of this Nation but of mankind at large.

Throughout the ages no religious organization has more persistently stood for the right of the individual in the self-determination of all matters, whether of religion or government.

Where is the American to-day that does not cherish the memory of Roger Williams and would not point with pride to the great State of Rhode Island as the first Commonwealth established with absolute civil and religious liberty? It stands as a monument to Baptist principles and as the pride of liberty-loving citizens.

Baptists have always championed the cause of education, and have believed in extending its benefits not alone to the favored classes but to the masses. The kindergartens, common schools, colleges, universities, and theological seminaries established and maintained by them compare favorably with the best in this or any other land.

In matters of home and foreign missions the world can point with pride to few more shining lights than William Carey, of England, or Adoniram Judson and Luther Rice, of America.

Baptists are not content to let their honors rest upon the achievements of the past, and in this respect Southern Baptists are no exception to the rule. With an approximate organization of 25,000 churches and a membership of about 3,000,000 persons, they determined a year ago to raise $75,000,000 in cash and five-year subscriptions for the furtherance of all denominational work other than local. A campaign was organized within six months, approximately $90,000,000 were subscribed, and more than $12,000,000 of this amount has been paid in cash.

In 10 foreign fields the Southern Baptists last year employed 400 American missionaries and 800 native workers. They also operated in such territory 482 mission schools and 11 hospitals. The present plan contemplates doubling the forces within the next four years.

They also support two of the largest theological seminaries in the world, a large Bible institute, and 140 other educational institutions, ranging either from rural academy to college or university, and enrolling 20,000 students, and possessing property valued at $25,000,000.

Mr. Speaker, it is not my purpose at this time to ask the further indulgence of the House, nor the immediate consideration of the resolution. I simply bring it to the attention of the House. G. N. HAUGEN,
J. C. MCLAUGHLIN,
GORDON LEE,
Managers on the part of the House.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, as stated in the report and statement, the conferees have reached an agreement on 279 of the 282 Senate amendments.

There are three amendments still in disagreement.

The bill as it passed the House carried $30,272,354. The Senate increased it to $32,140,761. As agreed to in conference, the bill has been increased over the amount carried in the House bill by $1,202,614 and decreased from the Senate amount $1,265,393.

The three amendments still in disagreement are No. 93, for vegetable seeds, carrying an appropriation of $239,416; No. 116, to ascertain the appraised value of pasturage; and No. 249, the so-called Comer amendment in reference to trading in cotton futures.

Mr. LONGWORTH. What was the first amendment to which the gentleman referred?

Mr. HAUGEN. No. 93, on page 31, relating to vegetable seeds.

If there are any other questions, I will be very glad to answer them.

Mr. LEE of Georgia. Let us take up the seed item first.

Mr. HAUGEN. It has been suggested that the conference report be disposed of, which will take care of the 279 amendments, and that after we have disposed of the report then the remaining three amendments can be taken up separately. The first one will be the one relating to vegetable seeds.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield to me a minute or two?

Mr. HAUGEN. Certainly.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I want to call attention to one or two technical things.

Senate amendment numbered 34, as printed in the House print with the Senate amendments numbered, strikes out, after the figures "$1,000," the words—

Four repair men, at $840 each; 6 repair men, at $720 each.

I hold the Senate amendment in my hand. It is as follows:

Page 6, line 15, strike out all after "$1,000" down to and including "each," page 6, line 16.

Of course the page and line refers to the engrossed copy of the bill. It so happens that page 6, line 16, contains the word "each" twice. And when you say strike out down to the word "each," which "each" is intended? Evidently the assumption would be that you strike out down to and including the word "each" where it first occurs. But the House print shows that the second word "each" is stricken out, and very likely that was the intention of the Senate. I do not know. Nobody knows so far as I can tell. And when you come to enrolling the bill somebody has got to guess whether the first word "each" or the second word "each" is where the amendment ceases. It is a very sloppy thing to require the enrolling clerk of the House to guess what the Senate and the House mean in legislation.

Mr. HAUGEN. Evidently the Senate overlooked the line.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The word "each" occurs twice in the same line.

Mr. HAUGEN. Not in the print that I have.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I am talking about the enrolled bill. The House print is not official. I have examined the engrossed copy of the bill on the Clerk's desk.

That is not all. On amendment 48 it is printed in the House print with Senate amendments numbered, strike out certain language and insert in lieu thereof the following: "6 laboratory assistants, at $1,200 each." And in amendment 51 there is an insertion in the print with the Senate amendments numbered, "5 messenger boys at $540 each."

I do not know who inserted the word "each" in this print. In neither case is the word "each" in the Senate amendment, and whoever inserted the word "each" in the print before the conferees violated the sanctity of the proceedings of this House and of Congress. It is not for the printing clerk, it is not for the Printing Office, to insert words in amendments which are not in the original amendment and lay them before the House as though they were there.

Senate amendment 48, which I hold in my hand, provides, insert "6 laboratory assistants at $1,200." The word "each" is not there. Amendment 51 provides, "insert 5 messenger boys at $540." The word "each" is not there. It had no place in the print of this bill with the Senate amendments numbered. Somebody has been violating the practice and the rule. We have a right to presume that when conferences are had on these bills they are made correctly and that nobody has inserted a word because, perchance, he thinks it ought to be there.

Mr. BLANTON. Has that been going on only since May 19 of last year?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I have frequently had occasion to correct such things when the Democrats were in power and when the Republicans were in power before. That has nothing to do with the question. I do not care who the employee is or what his politics is. I believe in keeping these things straight.

Mr. CANDLER. Will the gentleman from Iowa yield to me?

Mr. HAUGEN. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi five minutes.

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Speaker, I want to emphasize some statements that were made by the chairman of the committee. This conference report refers to the appropriations made in the House bill and the Senate bill. The House bill when it passed the House carried $30,270,354. As it passed the Senate it carried $32,740,761, which is $2,470,407 above the amount provided for in the House bill. Under the conference report as it comes back from the conference of the conferees it reduces the appropriation made in the Senate bill by $1,265,390, the appropriations carried in the conference report under consideration now being $31,475,368.

I have not the time to take up in detail these various amendments and discuss them separately, but what I do want to call attention to is the fact that quite a number of the appropriations, where they were increased in the Senate, provided for absolutely necessary work which was asked for by the Agricultural Department and which was needed in order to carry forward the agricultural development of the United States.

As I stated on the floor of the House when the Agricultural appropriation bill was under consideration, I do not believe that these appropriations made for the agricultural business of the country are in a real sense expenditures. On the contrary they are wise and profitable investments in an ever growing, expanding, and most important agricultural business which is the foundation of all the other interests of the country. [Applause.]

Therefore I believe that the appropriations as provided for in the Senate bill would have been, a great many of them, if not all of them, well retained in this bill and reported back to the House by the conferees for the consideration of the House and their adoption.

I am in favor of economy. I believe in economy. I do not believe that we should make any unnecessary or extravagant appropriations for any purpose as far as that matter is concerned, but I do not believe it is economy to reduce appropriations in this bill below what the Department of Agriculture itself says to this House is necessary in order to carry on the work which devolves on the department in the development of our agricultural interests.

I believe that is a false economy, not a real economy. For that reason I regret to see many of the reductions that are proposed to be made from the Senate bill, because I believe that the increases in many instances were justified, were necessary and ought to have been retained and adopted by the House. I wish I had the time to point out in detail some of them, but, as I said, I have not the time to take them up in detail. I take this occasion, however, to enter my protest against the reduction of the necessary appropriations for the great agricultural interests of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the adoption of the conference report.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I move to further insist upon the disagreement of the House to Senate amendment No. 93 and ask for a further conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa moves that the House further insist upon its disagreement to Senate amendment No. 93 and ask for a further conference.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, this is the amendment about seeds.

The SPEAKER. The motion has been agreed to.

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Speaker, the motion was voted upon, and the Speaker declared that the motion of the gentleman was agreed to.

Mr. BLANTON. That was upon the adoption of the conference report, was it not?

The SPEAKER. No.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the demand comes too late.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is well taken.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] notified us that he would give us time on that proposition, and he has attempted to do it. He did not understand that the matter had been voted on. The gentleman from Iowa did not understand it.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I made the motion in the usual order, and the motion was agreed to. I had no control over the putting of the motion. As far as I am concerned, I would be very glad——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa moved that the House further insist on its disagreement to amendment No. 93, and the Chair put the motion, and it was voted on and agreed to.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I do not think there are five men in the House who understood that they were voting on that proposition.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi makes the point of order that the demand for a division comes too late, and the Chair is obliged to sustain the point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that in view of the fact that I am sure that the membership of the House did not understand they were voting on the seed proposition, under the assurance given by the gentleman from Iowa, that that vote may be taken over again.

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I move to insist on disagreement to amendment No. 116——

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I have a preferential motion to make.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa has the floor.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House insist upon its disagreement to Senate amendment No. 116.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, what amendment is that?

Mr. FRENCH rose.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman from Idaho a member of the committee?

Mr. FRENCH. I am not on the committee, but I have a motion to make which I think is preferential.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is recognized.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede from its disagreement from Senate amendment No. 116 and concur in the same.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Idaho moves that the House recede from its disagreement to Senate amendment No. 116 and concur in the same.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, what is that amendment?

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUBEY].

Mr. LEE of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, may we not have the amendment reported?

The SPEAKER. Without objection the Clerk will report Senate amendment No. 116.

There was no objection, and the Clerk read as follows:

Senate amendment 116: Page 49, line 11, strike out: "$105,000: Provided, That $25,000 may be used by the Secretary of Agriculture for the purpose of ascertaining the appraised value of pasturage upon the national forests, which appraised value, when determined, may, in the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture, be made the basis of the charge for grazing permits upon such forests," and insert in lieu thereof "$80,000."

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH] makes a preferential motion to recede and concur after the gentleman from Iowa has made the motion to further insist. Does not that yield the floor to the gentleman from Idaho? Has he not the right to speak on his motion?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN], who has charge of the conference report, has charge of the time. While the motion of the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH] is preferential, it does not carry with it the control of the floor.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Has anyone in favor of the motion the right to speak?

The SPEAKER. He undoubtedly can get the right to speak, but it does not carry with it the control of the time. The gentleman from Iowa has yielded five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUBEY], and the gentleman from Missouri is recognized.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH] desires to speak now, I will be very glad to give way.

Mr. FRENCH. Oh, no; I shall be very glad to follow the gentleman from Missouri.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Speaker, this amendment was reported in the first place from the Committee on Agriculture. As originally drafted it came to the House as a part of the appropriation bill, but it went out on a point of order. We had considerable trouble in getting language that was not subject to the point of order, and two or three propositions were offered. When the first proposition offered by the committee in its report of the bill to the House went out on a point of order, another one was presented and it went out. Two or three others were offered, but all met the same fate. On the following day, when another section of the bill was reached where the amendment was germane, I offered the amendment in the language in which it is found in the print of the bill on page 49 and which the Senate has stricken out. This amendment is backed up by the Committee on Agriculture. The reason we put it in here was because we felt that the grazing lands in the national forests were not bringing in the money that they ought to bring in. We believe that the rates charged out there to the men who graze their cattle on the national forests are too low; that they ought to pay higher rates. The fact is that when we compare the rates that they pay with the rates paid for privately owned land in various parts of the country, including the western country, the rates paid in the national forests are very much lower than those paid for grazing upon private lands.

Why, Mr. Speaker, the rate paid in the national forests for grazing cattle is on the average only about 72 cents per head per year or season, while private pasture lands bring that much and more per month.

I believe that by keeping this amendment in this bill we will bring into the Treasury of the United States over $2,000,000 annually additional each year from the grazing lands. The Government owns these lands. The cattlemen who use these lands are anxious to secure these facilities of pasturage. They put their cattle on the land; they graze them there; they pay the small rates which are charged; they ship them to market, where they come into competition with the cattle from all parts of the country. By giving them these extremely low rates we are not doing the fair thing to other cattlemen and farmers of the country who are raising cattle and who must of necessity pay the usually high rates of pasturage. This proposition was overwhelmingly carried in the House on every vote that was taken with regard to it, and I am glad indeed that our conferees have insisted upon it and have brought it back here so as to enable the House to again vote on it. I hope that the amendment will stay in the bill, and that we will refuse to adopt the motion to recede from our former disagreement.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH].

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Speaker, there are two or three points of view from which this amendment can be considered. It was put on in the House. The Senate after considering the matter struck it from the bill, and my motion is that the House recede and concur in the Senate amendment. The essential reason is that it is an unnecessary expenditure of $25,000. The Department of Agriculture has full authority under present law to do everything that is proposed to be done by the amendment. The proper officers of the department have advised me to this effect and that in the regular orderly process of handling the work of the Forest Service they have complete authority to estimate or appraise the values of grazing rights, and the Secretary has the further authority to enter into arrangements or agreements with permittees to graze their stock upon the forest reserves. He has all the authority now that would be conferred if the amendment should prevail.

Mr. LANGLEY and Mr. EVANS of Nebraska rose.

Mr. FRENCH. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. LANGLEY. I just wanted to ask the gentleman if he knows what the purpose of this amendment is?

Mr. FRENCH. I know what it is and I am coming to that. I now yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Did the authorities with whom the gentleman conferred indicate that they were going to do that?

Mr. FRENCH. The authorities with whom I conferred indicated to me that the Agricultural Department is opposed to this amendment, that it does not desire the amendment, that it has all the authority now that the amendment would confer, and that if the money is to be expended it would mean to speed up the work and that the work called for will be done in an orderly way in regular course of business and in that way no extra expense would be incurred. It will be done in ample time to meet the situation as permits expire.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. FRENCH. I will be glad to yield.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Then the gentleman's information is that unless there is some pressure put upon the department there will be nothing done?

Mr. FRENCH. On the contrary, I think the gentleman has misunderstood my language. The department is doing now the precise thing the amendment asks that it do, but in an orderly way, and in an orderly way it will not cost the Government anything other than the normal administration of the Forest Service——

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENCH. I will be glad to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MONDELL. Is not this the situation: The Secretary of Agriculture now has full authority and discretion in the matter of fixing the rates on the forest reserves?

Mr. FRENCH. Absolutely.

Mr. MONDELL. He can advance them at any moment he sees fit——

Mr. FRENCH. Absolutely.

Mr. MONDELL. He has full authority to investigate in order to secure knowledge——

Mr. FRENCH. Unquestionably.

Mr. MONDELL. So what this amendment does is to give $25,000 for that purpose which was not asked?

Mr. FRENCH. Yes; and which the Forest Service does not want.

Mr. SINNOTT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENCH. I will.

Mr. SINNOTT. Is it not also true that the Agricultural Department in most cases has entered into contracts running over a period of five years, and by the time those contracts lapse they can make all the investigation they see fit?

Mr. LANGLEY rose.

Mr. FRENCH. Let me just answer the question that has been asked and I will be glad to yield. The gentleman wants to know if it is true the Secretary of Agriculture has entered into contracts covering a period of five years. I will say that is true as to about 60 per cent of the permits outstanding, and it is to the distinct advantage of the Government that the department enter into these contracts for fixed periods. If you were to offer the grazing privileges upon the forest reserves for merely annual periods of time the people would pay very low rates for the privilege, because they can not establish themselves and handle their business unless they can have a definite period of several years within which to operate. Five years is a most conservative time.

Mr. LANGLEY. Is not that an anomaly in our history, that a department declines an appropriation which the Congress proposes to give them?

Mr. FRENCH. Oh, not under the conditions that exist here. The department is acting in good faith in carrying out its policy, and it has been most beneficial to the Government. Something like two or three years ago contracts were entered into involving 60 per cent of the permits on the forest areas, and upon a fixed rate. We do not want at this time to have those contracts broken. We want good faith on the part of the Government to be carried out toward the persons who have the leases. If the individual Members of the House stood in the place of the Government they would carry out their contracts as honest business men.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LAYTON. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have five minutes more.

Mr. HAUGEN. I yield two minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. RUBEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENCH. I will be glad to yield first to the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. LAYTON].

Mr. LAYTON. I simply wanted to ask the question whether or not this was an appropriation of $25,000 in order to carry out what the department already has the power to carry out?

Mr. FRENCH. Absolutely; and in an orderly way the department will obtain all this information and do the work without the expenditure of $25,000.

Mr. RUBEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENCH. I will be glad to do so.

Mr. RUBEY. I was called out of the Chamber a moment ago and did not hear all of the gentleman's remarks. I am informed that he made the statement that the Department of Agriculture was not asking for this; that the Department of Agriculture does not need this authority. The officials of the Forest Service of the Department of Agriculture—they were examined quite extensively on this subject; and they asked that this $25,000 be set aside for this purpose, and that specific authority be granted so that these lands could be appraised, and the committee gave them what they asked. So that it does come from the Department of Agriculture, and they are asking for it and they want it. Mr. Graves and those in charge of the Forest Service were in favor of it and so expressed themselves before our committee.

Mr. LAYTON. Will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. FRENCH. I will be glad to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LAYTON. Does the gentleman from Missouri contend that the department has not got that authority now?

Mr. RUBEY. I do. They say they have not authority to make this appraisal, and that they want that authority, and that is the reason we gave it to them.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Speaker, I will say that I have been advised by the proper officer in the department, who has charge of this matter, that they do not desire the appropriation; and I think if the gentleman could refer to a letter that has been written to the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture by Col. Graves, who at the time was the head of the Forest Service, he would see it would bear out the statement I have made. I think the letter will be presented by some one to the House during the debate.

Mr. LAYTON. My recollection about such matters is that the department has the right to fix the amount charged per acre for grazing and all of these purposes.

Mr. FRENCH. It has that right now.

Mr. LAYTON. Certainly. And that right is not limited. It is a flexible right, up or down, according to their judgment.

Mr. LANGLEY. Is there any communication from the Secretary of Agriculture on the subject?

Mr. FRENCH. I do not doubt that the committee has information on the subject. I have only one word more. Since the department has full authority to do all that the amendment provides, and since the information would be furnished in orderly way, without extra cost, my motion should prevail. Apparently the object of the amendment is to try to force the department to tear up the permits that are outstanding.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be again reported.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR].

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, if there ever was an appropriation that was utterly useless, uncalled for, unwise, unjust, unnecessary, and ought not to be made, it certainly is this one, and for a great number of reasons. In the first place, it is absolutely in bad faith. It is a deliberate and brazen attempt to repudiate all the existing five-year permit agreements between the stockmen and the Department of Agriculture. I can not believe that the American Congress will ever knowingly be guilty of such a pusillanimous and contemptible action as that would be.

Secondly, this provision is wholly and absolutely unnecessary. The Secretary of Agriculture, through the Forest Service, now has full and complete power to make this appraisement and reclassification of grazing fees whenever he wants to.

Neither the Secretary of Agriculture nor the Forest Service is asking for this appropriation, or this authority or direction. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUBEY] is entirely mistaken and absolutely wrong in the statement he has just made to the House to the effect that the Agricultural Department and the Forest Service want this appropriation.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I can not yield. I have only five minutes.

I am going to take the liberty of reading into the RECORD a letter from Col. H. S. Graves, the Forester himself, to the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, dated April 3 of this year, on this subject, because this is an official communication, and it conclusively shows how entirely erroneous are the statements of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUBEY].

Mr. RUBEY. Was he a member of the commission at that time, or had he resigned?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. He was the Forester at the time and signed the letter as such. He was the chief officer of the Forest Service of the United States. He had not left the service at that time. His resignation did not take effect until, I think, about the first of this month. The Mr. W. B. Greeley referred to in the letter is the present Forester. This letter very fully and clearly presents this matter and gives the position of the Forest Service; and in fairness to the Forest Service officials, I think the letter should go into the RECORD, so that the stockmen of the West may not have any misunderstanding on this subject. I do not want them to wrongly blame the Forest Service or lose confidence in the good faith and fair dealing of the Forest Service officials. The letter is as follows:

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
FOREST SERVICE,
Washington, April 3, 1920.

Finance appropriation estimates, 1921.

Hon. GILBERT N. HAUGEN,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. HAUGEN: The importance of the question as to the grazing fees charged on the national forests is so great that I wish to summarize briefly the position of the Forest Service on this matter as expressed by Col. Greeley and myself to you this morning.

The fees for grazing permits were finally established by the Secretary of Agriculture in 1918, after an exhaustive investigation and extended hearings, as representing the actual value of the pasturage under the restrictions and conditions imposed by the Forest Service with a view to making the range increasingly productive. The Secretary of Agriculture then authorized the Forest Service to issue permits for five-year periods in cases where the use of national forest ranges was sufficiently settled so that rights to graze stated quantities of stock for five-year periods could properly be authorized. Five-year permits have, in fact, been issued for approximately 60 per cent of the stock using the national forests. These five-year permits provide, among other things, for the schedule of grazing fees fixed by the Secretary of Agriculture in 1918. While the permits are necessarily, as a matter of Federal law, revocable in the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture, it was understood that the schedule of grazing fees fixed in 1918 would apply during the life of these permits in so far as the matter lay in the discretion of the Department of Agriculture.

It is my conviction, therefore, that the good faith of the Department of Agriculture is committed to maintaining the existing grazing fees during the life of the present five-year permits. It is true that the greatly inflated values during the last two years, combined with the effects of serious droughts in some of the Western States, have for the time being made the present commercial value of national forest pasturage greater than the existing scale of grazing fees. Wholly aside from the question as to the permanence of the present scale of values or as to the wisdom of the United States Government taking advantage of the situation in a purely commercial spirit, I am convinced that the public gain through the encouragement given by conservative fees to the development of agricultural land in the vicinity of the forests, to the increased production of hay, and to the increase in the production of live stock much more than offsets any financial loss in the grazing fees themselves. I am satisfied that the present fees should remain in effect until the close of the season of 1923, when, following a thorough appraisal of the value of national forest range under the conditions then existing, the grazing fees should be redetermined and established on a basis which represents the actual value of the privileges obtained.

The foregoing was the position which we undertook to present at the hearings of the House committee. After the general hearings it was my understanding that the committee desired to insert some language in the bill directing an increase in the fees. Accordingly I undertook to cooperate with the subcommittee in drafting language that would meet their desires. This action on my part did not, however, mean an advocacy to take action that failed to recognize the good faith of the department in the matter of its five-year permits already issued.

If, however, the Congress does not approve the department's policy, I feel that any provision in the appropriation bill or otherwise regarding an increase in the fee should be a very clear-cut direction, which would make it mandatory upon the Secretary of Agriculture to immediately reappraise the existing commercial value of national forest pasturage and thereupon to reestablish the grazing fees in accordance with such appraised value. If this course is taken, an appropriation of at least $25,000 should be available for the cost of reappraisal.

Very sincerely, yours,

H. S. GRAVES, Forester.

Mr. Speaker, I probably should say that I wrote a formal letter to Col. Greeley, the present Forester, and asked him directly and officially what the position of the Forest Service now is on this very important and far-reaching matter. I said to him that I was writing and inquiring on behalf of not only myself but all other western Members of Congress and also on behalf of all the stockmen of the western forest reserve States. In reply he wrote me a letter dated to-day and transmitting the foregoing letter to me, as follows:

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
FOREST SERVICE,
Washington, May 13, 1920.

Finance appropriation estimate, 1921.

Hon. EDWARD T. TAYLOR,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. TAYLOR: I have just received your request of this morning for a statement of the position of the Forest Service regarding the legislation proposed in the pending Agricultural appropriation bill in relation to the fees charged for the use of pasturage upon the national forests. I can comply with your request in no better way than by transmitting a copy of a letter which my predecessor, Col. H. S. Graves, sent to the chairman of the House Committee on Agriculture, under date of April 3, 1920. I concur thoroughly in the summary of the situation and the position of the Forest Service regarding it, as presented in Col. Graves's letter.

Very sincerely, yours,

W. B. GREELEY, Forester.

Mr. Speaker, the provisions of this bill—that is, that part of amendment No. 116 which the conference committee has disagreed upon and to which the cattlemen of the West are so strongly opposed—reads as follows:

Provided, That $25,000 may be used by the Secretary of Agriculture for the purpose of ascertaining the appraised value of pasturage upon the national forests, which appraised value, when determined, may, in the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture, be made the basis of the charge for grazing permits upon such forests.

Now, gentlemen of the House, this is not a partisan matter at all. It is first a question of fair dealing; a question of a square deal to the cattlemen. It is also a matter of very great financial consequence not only to the cattlemen but to everyone else in the forest-reserve States. We Members from the West represent the unanimous sentiment of every one of these 17 States. We want to voice its unanimous and very emphatic protest against this provision of all stockmen who range their cattle on these forest reserves. There is no difference of opinion among the entire population of these States. We know whereof we speak, and we know that the Government of the United States has entered into a solemn and fair and square five-year agreement with those men; they have made their contracts and all their arrangements accordingly, and many of them have borrowed money accordingly, and are conducting their business at this time in reliance upon those five-year permits, and it is neither common honesty nor fair dealing for this great American Congress to brazenly and ruthlessly trample those agreements under foot and enact a provision welching on its promises and agreements, and boldly saying to those stockmen that you are going to repudiate those five-year contracts, without any hearing or notice, and increase their grazing fees 300 per cent. You can outvote the West and you may think you can get away with this infamous outrage, but I say to you that you will not accomplish it.

The stockmen have lost heavily during the past winter. Hay to-day in some parts of my district is costing $40 to $50 a ton. The cattlemen have lost thousands of cattle during the past winter and this spring. They are far removed from the market. They have innumerable hardships with which to contend that the stockmen and farmers do not have in any other States. We have all of these handicaps, and when the Secretary of Agriculture, with full authority, has fixed these fees, the only honest thing to do is to let them alone.

I want to insert in the RECORD a letter to me from the Colorado Stockgrowers Association on this subject, as follows:

DENVER, COLO., February 21, 1920.

Hon. EDWARD T. TAYLOR,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. TAYLOR: In discussing the relative merits and demerits in raising the fees on the forest reserve, we wish to preface our remarks by explicitly declaring that we are in no way hostile to the Forestry Department, nor opposed to its general administrative efficiency.

Believing that the department is not in possession of all the actual facts in the case and that unfair and uninformed influences are striving to dangerously jeopardize the western live-stock interests, we offer the following for your consideration:

First. We believe that our business interests will be greatly jeopardized if the department does not live up to its moral obligations in fulfilling the five-year permit regulation indorsed at Cheyenne in 1917. If the department is going to repudiate its word in this instance, our confidence and faith is destroyed. We can not plan for any future for our business if we do not have the assurances that both parties to an agreement will not consider their promises inviolate. The corner stone of men's living in a civilized community is the certain knowledge that the other man's promise will be fulfilled.

Second. Owing to the present unsettled state of conditions, politically and economically, no man can say to-day what is fair and equitable in prices. Our barometers of stability have been destroyed; and relative comparisons are impossible from a purely monetary standpoint.

Third. In view of general conditions of unrest and dissatisfaction due to the ever-soaring cost of the necessities of life, it seems to us an unsound business policy to add fuel to the smoldering fires of economic unrest by further increasing the cost of live-stock production.

The Federal Government should be the first to attempt to ameliorate living conditions by reducing their fees, rather than by increasing them. An increase in range fees means an extra expense in raising live stock, and if the producers are to avoid bankruptcy the consumer must, and ultimately will, pay the bill. Your eastern feeder can only remain in business if the western producer can raise the product to supply him. Present prices are touching the prohibitive point from the consumer's standpoint as well as from the producer's standpoint.

Permit us to call your attention to the fact that as soon as war was declared every live-stock producer was urged to increase his holdings to the limit under the slogan "Food will win the war." Your patriotic stockman did not slack in his duty, but put aside the chance for temporary gain and did withhold his stock from market and carried to full capacity his farm and range holdings. Then the Government arbitrarily passed the meatless-day law, destroying the market for live stock, until the end of the war found us with a surplus of stock, and now money-exchange rates have decreased the export demand and we are holding the fatted calf, produced at a great expense and depreciated from 25 to 50 per cent in value. Now, to reward us for our patriotism, self-sacrifice, and unselfishness you propose to add insult to injury by imposing a destructive range fee upon us.

Our products show a greater decline in values than any other commodity. We were not at any time during the last three years permitted to take advantage of the exorbitant profits to tide us over periods of stress that the laborer and manufacturer enjoyed and are still enjoying. When this opportunity presented itself the Government stepped in and arbitrarily tacked the price on our meats, wool, and grain. The war took most of our best men in uniform; the rest were lured away from us by wages that would be confiscatory in our business. Our products have tumbled. Everything that we use from labor to machinery, as well as transportation services, have doubled and trebled in prices, and the quality and efficiency at the same time depreciating 50 per cent in value.

Regarding the relative value of range conditions as compared to private pastures, without at this time elaborating the details, we ask you to consider the following before judging the merits of each:

The relative great distance from railroad to markets.

The loss entailed by long drives to and from the range.

The difference in the carrying capacity per acre on the forests, forcing stock to travel great distances in search of food and water.

The loss incidental to storms, lightning, predatory animals, high altitude, and rough topography of the country.

The difficulty of breeding our cows in rough mountainous regions; the inability to keep close watch over the stock on account of the extent and character of the country.

The expense and danger of hauling and placing salt in proper places on the high range.

The increased cost and difficulty in getting men who are willing to stay in these remote and isolated camps, who have to do their own cooking, horseshoeing, washing, and who are familiar with the range.

The shrinkage incidental to round-ups and gathering time, holding the herd on poor feed for days until the gathering is completed, and then driving without feed or water, in many cases for from two to three days, before the cattle are finally distributed to their respective winter quarters.

Loss due to poisonous plants. Mudholes that mire the stock, especially in the spring.

The inability to give close supervision to the stock on account of the wide area of distribution.

Many of these above-mentioned facts contribute to a calf crop running from 40 per cent to 60 per cent as compared with the 90 per cent or 95 per cent calf crop in private pastures. Loss of range live stock amounts to 10 per cent, whereas in private pastures less than 1 per cent is lost.

On account of the general mixing of large numbers of cattle on the range, the danger is always great for infection—sharcoptic and saroptic mange in cattle; scabies, tick infection, and hemorrhagic septicemia in sheep. The loss from theft of stock from the range and encroachment upon our range to-day by hundreds of fishermen and tourists and campers is causing considerable loss by disturbing the live stock in their grazing and scaring them further from the better feed in the bottoms and watering places along the streams, besides an actual damage to forage by campers. The ever-present danger from forest fires by careless campers and occasional loss from careless hunters.

Would you consider a private pasture as valuable if your stock was continually molested by tourists and your grass and stream encroached upon by them, if you had no control over those conditions? We think not.

You sell us feed and rent us certain territory at a good price and then advertise the same place as a national playground for the whole world to come to and pollute as they see fit—the great national forests. Yes; they belong to all the people, but without the special privilege of grazing that we pay a good price for the world would go hungry. The necessities of life must transcend in their rights and privileges those of purely sentimental and recreational rights or privileges; the world can not be clothed or fed if the majority or a large per cent of its people are unproductive. Every loafer that exists some one else must do an extra share for. The farmer and live-stock producer is getting tired of working 12 to 16 hours a day and producing at a loss to supply an indifferent, unappreciative, improvident, and profiteering public.

If we should strike, somebody will howl.

Very truly, yours,

BOARD OF CONTROL OF COLORADO STOCKGROWERS' ASSOCIATION.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether what I shall say will be for or against the Senate amendment. I would like to get a little information. The gentleman from Colorado favored the amendment and opposed the provision in the bill because he said it would be welching on the five-year contracts entered into. I believe in carrying out those contracts according to the spirit of the contracts. This amendment does not interfere with them at all. This amendment only provides for appraisement of the land, and then provides that the Secretary of Agriculture may in his discretion use the appraisal as the basis of the charge for grazing permits. I take it that the Secretary of Agriculture, whoever he may be, would fulfill the spirit of any existing contract and not change the basis of the charge on existing contracts. I should have very little use for any official who would not take that attitude.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. As these permits run for three years, what is the occasion for making the appraisement at this time instead of nearer the time when the permits expire?

Mr. TINCHER. It is but a small per cent of the reserves that are covered by permits. The greater portion are not covered by permits of the kind described.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I understood the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] to say 60 per cent.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Sixty per cent of the cattle now running on the national forests are under the five-year permit.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. That is what I understood him to say. But I assume probably if an appraisement were made, that new permits that were issued would probably be made upon about the same basis as existing permits.

I do not know whether the appraisement ought to be made this year or next year or the year the permits expire. One thing is very certain to my mind, that it would be desirable to have an appraisement of these grazing lands, and I take it that unless it is authorized and an appropriation is specifically made for it at some time the appraisement will not be made.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Certainly. I am trying to get information.

Mr. FRENCH. I was talking to-day with the administrative officer of the bureau in the department which has charge especially of grazing, and he told me that if the appraisement is to be speeded up and done at once, then an appropriation is necessary, but if it can take its orderly time, awaiting the expiration naturally of the permits issued, under the regular administration of the department, with the funds that they have, this work will all be done.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. How soon?

Mr. FRENCH. In each instance to meet the expiration of the permits as the permits expire. The permits do not all expire at any one time.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. No; but the statement is made now that most of them expire three years from now.

Mr. FRENCH. Approximately 60 per cent; yes, and it would seem that if that is the case——

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Somebody here ought to know whether the appraisements are up to date or not. I have not had that understanding myself.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Certainly.

Mr. HAUGEN. Every permit contains a clause providing that it can be terminated at any time, and it was stated in the Secretary's letter that only a few permits can be issued for a certain time.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Of course, I do not agree myself that where the Government enters into a lease, as it does with reference to post offices, a 10-year lease, with the right of termination at any time, the Government has any right to terminate unless there is a change in the conditions and circumstances. I think that the Government, though it holds the right, has no moral right to exercise that right without good reason for it, and the people who use the range have the right to expect the Government to carry out its contract.

The gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH] speaks of the Government "speeding up" on this matter. Well, it would be a year before this money would be expended. I do not know how much speeding up there would be. I am inclined to be against all appropriations for any purpose. [Laughter and applause.]

I am inclined to be more strongly against all appropriations unless there is a mighty good reason for them, and it did seem to me that there is apparently a good reason for this, and I do not understand now why gentlemen representing these grazing States are so bitterly opposed to having an appraisement. They are manifesting opposition, strong opposition, when I have never known them to be so anxious about the expenditures of the Government if they went to their States ordinarily, and that has led me to wonder whether there is not something about this that I do not understand; that they are opposed to this because it is right. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. I will yield one minute to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Does the gentleman recall that when this bill was before this House for consideration an attempt was made to raise the grazing fee about 300 per cent, as I recall, and coupled with that was this provision for a reappraisal? I think we have that in mind. It was in the bill originally.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. It may be.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. An attempt to void contracts that have been made and raise them two or three hundred per cent after the men have made all their business arrangements, have bought their cattle, and everything of that kind; and they feel that it would be very unjust.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. That may be a legitimate reason for the attitude of gentlemen from those States.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. That is the fear that is in the minds of these gentlemen.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I think I can explain to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] why these gentlemen from the West are opposed to this provision. Personally, I do not think it makes any great difference whether this provision remains in the bill or not. I do not think it would affect the grazing fee on the reserves a particle. But the gentlemen from the West are opposed to it because it is in the bill at the suggestion of those who insist that the grazing fees ought to be doubled and trebled. That is why they are opposed to it, because the gentlemen who favor it do so because they think that through the medium of the examination proposed there is likely to be a great increase in grazing fees.

The situation is this: The Secretary of Agriculture has now full authority to fix grazing fees. I do not know how many contracts there are out that can be abrogated, and I do not care particularly, because the Secretary, I think, has retained discretion to modify them, however he may be morally bound. He has full authority and jurisdiction now. It is his matter. It is under his jurisdiction, and there is no rhyme or reason for giving him $25,000 to make examinations such as he makes in any event all the time in the ordinary course of business without any additional appropriation; to give him $25,000 with the expectation that he will expend it in making examinations that he will make in any event in the course of administration in the hope on the part of some one that by giving him this additional money in some curious way there will be an increase of grazing fees which would not otherwise occur.

The department, I say, has now full authority, full discretion. The department is not asking for any additional money to make investigations into the subject matter. Their investigations go on all the time. In the reports which they receive from their rangers all over the reserves they are fully informed as to the conditions. They can fix the rates as they see fit, and raise them when they think they ought to be raised, and there is no reason why the Congress should furnish an additional appropriation to do what is now being done without additional appropriations in the hope that in some way not clearly stated it will result in the increasing of grazing fees which some gentlemen think ought to be increased. [Applause.]

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TINCHER].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, I just want to call the attention of the House to this fact, that there is not a $25,000 additional appropriation called for in this amendment. The bill called for exactly the same amount before the amendment was offered, and the amendment simply authorizes the use of $25,000 of that money to make the appraisals.

I want to call attention to another proposition, that in 1919, on any kind of a fair basis, as estimated by the gentleman who wrote the letter that was read here by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR], this Government lost in the neighborhood of $2,000,000 in that it did not receive fair value for these rentals. I have no quarrel with the western cattlemen. In fact, I have a whole lot of sympathy with them. I know that we all had a hard enough time to try to produce the meat for this country in the last year; but the Government not only owns the national forests, but every year every taxpayer in the United States pays his taxes to uphold them, and the same Congressmen who are here opposing this appraisement to-day are fluent in arguments for appropriations for the upkeep of these forests, to build roads and fences, and make these forests desirable for pasture; and the same committee that brought in this recommendation of this amendment brought in an appropriation to keep up the forests. Last year, 1919, the cattlemen who grazed in the national forests paid an average per season—not per month or per week, but for the whole season—of 71 cents for a full-grown, adult animal that grazed in the national forests. Think of it. There is no comparison between that and what they pay for privately owned pastures anywhere in the land; and I say to you that if we were to add $25,000 to this appropriation and thereby procure for the National Treasury a million or two of dollars, which is justly its due, it would not be a bad appropriation.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TINCHER. I decline to yield. I got the figure of 71 cents from Mr. Graves.

When we were questioning Mr. Graves before the committee we were simply asking him questions for facts, without communicating to him what we intended to do or what our idea was; and I want to say to you that his answers to those questions would not justify or corroborate the letter written by him since he left the service, and it was dated after the fact was announced that he was leaving the service.

I am not in favor of repudiating any contract. There are no contracts outstanding. There is to be no broken faith with the stockmen. We have had them before our committee.

Here is another peculiar thing about this: Now, just stop and think for a minute. These gentlemen say, "Oh, we have a five-year contract, and we have bought our cattle, and we are going to keep them in these pastures for five years." What kind of looking cattle are you going to have? How old were they when you bought them? Most cattle are butchered before they are three years old. Who ever heard tell of a man buying his cattle with a view to keeping them for five years?

Now, I believe you are hurting yourselves. I am not finding fault with you. I congratulate you upon the activity you show for your constituents. If they are getting any pasturage for one-fourth or one-fifth what they ought to be paying for it, and the Government is furnishing it, I do not blame you at all for making a fight, and I am not going to quarrel with anyone; but this provision, which was the best the Agricultural Committee could get by reason of the rules and regulations, simply authorizes the Secretary of Agriculture to find out what the legitimate, fair, honest charge should be, and to make that charge. It does not increase the appropriation a dollar, because the bill carried the same amount before. The amendment authorizes the use of $25,000 for this purpose instead probably of building a road or some fences out there in the forests.

I believe that by opposing this amendment you are going to create a sentiment here that will make some of us at least think you have got a right smart bonanza out there and that you are afraid to have any kind of an appraisement that will disturb it. I believe, if I were in your place, I would withdraw opposition to this. Think of the Secretary of Agriculture in 1918 making a five-year contract for the use of the national forests, at 71 cents a head per season, for grazing live stock.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TINCHER. May I have one more minute?

Mr. HAUGEN. I yield to the gentleman one minute.

Mr. TINCHER. Just think of it. I am surprised to hear that 60 per cent of them are under contract. I do not know how you got at those figures; but if there are 60 per cent of them under contract you ought to be willing to agree to this amendment. Nobody can abrogate a legitimate contract with the Government, and no one wants to; but you ought to be willing to pay at least one-fourth of what the other 40 per cent is worth to the Government and quit opposing this, because I think it really looks like you have got a better thing than you have got. It looks like you have got something you do not want disturbed.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TINCHER. No.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HAUGEN. I yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER].

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, it is unfortunate that the gentlemen who are opposed to receding and concurring in the Senate amendment know so very little about the forest reserves and the raising of cattle and horses and sheep. Gentlemen talk about ranging cattle for a year in those reserves. Anybody knows that they do not get more than three or four months at the best. In addition to that, these very men who are paying for placing their stock upon the range are paying taxes to build roads and to maintain that country, and to assist in supervising and controlling the land and the country in which these reserves are. They pay taxes to maintain civil government and should not be taxed to ruin. It is all right to talk about exacting a large fee for pasturing, but I will guarantee that from the records presented before the committee there is not one of these forest reserves where the pasturage exceeds three and one-half months a year. They have their own pasture the rest of the year, and in the wintertime they take up their stock and feed them. Now, you want to place a heavier burden upon these men who are already overburdened by taxes and high expenses in everything they do. They have to pay for their stock, they have to pay extra wages, they have to pay an annual tax upon their land, they have to pay by virtue of the increase of everything, but you want to put a heavier burden upon them and practically put them out of business.

But the peculiar thing about this amendment is that it is intended by a legislative act, keenly and nicely worded, to relieve the Secretary of Agriculture from avoiding these contracts, and then say that it is a direction of Congress, and that is what it is.

They will not have men who are familiar with this appraisement. These young men under the civil service from the East can go into this territory and appraise the feed, and then if the appraisement is raised even for a slight amount the contract can be nullified under the legislation. That is what it is put in for, and that is why it is worded in this way. It says:

Provided, That $25,000 may be used by the Secretary of Agriculture for the purpose of ascertaining the appraised value of pasturage upon the national forests, which appraised value, when determined, may, in the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture, be made the basis of the charge for grazing permits upon such forests.

The Secretary of Agriculture will send these men into the forest reserves. The Forester knows personally practically all of the permittees on the ranges. They gather together twice a year, sometimes oftener—the farmers, the permittees—and they go over the condition of the ranges, what they themselves have, and they generally fix a range fee that is fairly reasonable to the Government and decent and proper to the permittees. They have been increasing the fees for the last 10 years, practically every year, and these permittees have been paying in practically on all of these forest reserves a full, fair, and just remuneration to the Government for the benefit they have received. Why burden them any more? Why pass this bill with a provision which compels the Secretary of Agriculture to avoid and repudiate the contract with the permittee, which he has entered into with these men for the next five years? I am satisfied the Secretary of Agriculture does not want to do this. He is too fair and just a man.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CANDLER].

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER], who has just taken his seat, refers to contracts made between the Government of the United States and the cattle raisers for grazing purposes. These contracts are like other Government contracts, subject to be revoked by the Government whenever the conditions change.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANDLER. For a question.

Mr. RAKER. Under this provision, by all conscience and decency, the Secretary of Agriculture must violate or avoid the contract. Here is a legislative action which directs him to do it, and that is the very purpose of its being put in.

Mr. CANDLER. It directs him to do so in his discretion. It leaves it with him. If he desires to carry it out, he has that right. The Government of the United States by the very terms of the contract has the right to revoke the contract whenever it is for the interest of the Government.

Under the provisions of this bill, as called attention to a few minutes ago by the gentleman from Kansas, my good friend Mr. TINCHER, it does not appropriate a single dollar over and above what is carried in the paragraph itself. It simply states that out of the original amount $25,000 shall be set aside to make this investigation. Therefore it does not take any more money to provide that a certain amount shall be used for this specific purpose—that is, to see what the conditions are with reference to the grazing proposition, and then give the Secretary of Agriculture, in his discretion, the right to do what is best and proper under the circumstances after he finds out what the real facts are.

Mr. GANDY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANDLER. Not now.

Mr. GANDY. The gentleman does not want to make a mistake—the Senate amendment cuts this down $25,000.

Mr. CANDLER. It carves it out of the original appropriation.

Mr. GANDY. It reduces the appropriation $25,000.

Mr. CANDLER. It directs that $25,000 out of the total shall be used for this specific purpose, and therefore it does not take any extra money. Are you gentlemen from the West uneasy for fear the Department of Agriculture, through the Secretary, in this investigation may find out that there is some reason why conditions should be changed? If he finds out that there is no reason why the conditions should be changed he will not change them, but if he finds that it is necessary, in justice and all fairness, he is given the authority and direction in this provision to make changes. I want to ask you if you believe it is enough for these people to pay only 71 cents a head per annum for the grazing of cattle in the national forests? If this provision is carried out and the amendment suggested should be adopted the Secretary of Agriculture could require these men to pay around $2 a head annually for grazing on the national forests. Is that exorbitant? Certainly not. It is very, very reasonable, indeed.

Another thing, this appropriation bill carries over $6,000,000 for the national forests. The Government gets back something between $2,000,000 and $3,000,000 a year. You are talking economy; you are talking about saving money; you are talking about putting money into the Treasury of the United States. I believe in economy, and therefore I believe in getting money honestly from reasonable and just sources to put in the Treasury of the United States to meet the deficit in this Forest Service. If you adopt this amendment, it may result in putting into the Treasury between $2,000,000 and $3,000,000 a year. There is a deficit for the National Forest Service of about $3,000,000 or $4,000,000 every year. When you get back all you can collect for the grazing and sale of timber, and from every other source from which revenues for this service comes, it still leaves a deficit of about $3,000,000 or $4,000,000.

Let us make up some of this deficit by making these people pay what is just and what is right for grazing cattle on the national forests and Government lands. They say they have the right to use them; that they belong to the Government of the United States. While the legal title is in the Government of the United States, yet, in reality, they belong to all the people of the United States, because the people are required to go down into their pockets and by taxation furnish the money to keep these lands up and take care of them by superintendence and in every other way. Hence, it is the people who furnish the money to take care of these national forests and public lands, and I insist that these people who graze their stock upon them help the other people to take care of the property by paying a reasonable, just, and honest rental when they use these lands for their private use and benefit. That is good business, and it is right and just, and therefore the motion of the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH] should be defeated and the motion of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUBEY] should be adopted. [Applause.]

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. GANDY].

Mr. GANDY. Mr. Speaker, I feel that I ought to say at the outset of my remarks that this is not the first time Members from the West have felt called upon to defend the interests of their constituents because of the lack of complete information on the part of Members from other States. I confess that the statement of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUBEY] that it is the direct purpose of those who believe in this amendment to raise the grazing fees two or three times what they are now, frightens me. There is enough inequality at this time without having more. There are approximately 600,000,000 acres of public land and 155,000,000 acres of forest reserve lands. The forest reserve lands are grazed under permits or leases. All public lands are open to everyone, so that only a small portion of the stock in the West is grazed on forest reserve land, the greater portion being grazed on the public lands, and no fee or permit has ever been required for that.

The grazing within a national forest is a distinct help to the forest; and I say to you that if every head of stock were to be taken out of the forest reserves through the coming year, the Agricultural Committee of this House, when they bring in the next appropriation bill, would be compelled to report many times the appropriation for fire protection than they have heretofore. The grazing of the grass keeps it from becoming a fire menace. The residents and workers scattered throughout the forest areas help put out the fires that start, so that the stock in the forest is a distinct benefit, for without stock the ranchers could not live there. If you drive the stock out, then the chairman of this committee, whether he be the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] or some other gentleman, would come before the House and endeavor to get the stock back, because the stock, its owners, and caretakers must be there for the proper protection of the forest lands.

The Agricultural Department can now raise the grazing fees to any sum it wishes. In 1918 it raised the fees, and it can do it again. It has local men in every one of these forests. It can get the information any time it desires. That being true, why should this Congress by direct language say that the grazing on all of these forests should be appraised, and then that that appraisement should be made the basis of the grazing fees within the forest? Certainly this Government ought not to attempt to make money from those residents of the national forests who by our public-land laws were invited to make their homes there. They are of direct benefit to the Government in its administration of forest reservations, and the additional grazing fees these Members hope to get of right ought not to be required. Those forest-reserve residents are oppressed enough as it is.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MANN of Illinois). The time of the gentleman from South Dakota has expired.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD an opinion written by Judge Advocate General Crowder upon the constitutionality of the National Guard provisions in the Army reorganization bill, now pending in conference.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, how long is this?

Mr. CALDWELL. It is not very long. It just covers the subject, and I think we ought to have it in the RECORD.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri objects.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MCLAUGHLIN].

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, a number of gentlemen from public-land States have spoken very interestingly. I do not recall, however, when they showed more feeling over this matter since the policy of making charges in the forest service for timber or for grazing was inaugurated. Some here will remember when all Government property out there was free. These people in the West took it or used it just as they pleased. The suggestion then was made that what they took or what they used they should pay for. There was a terrible outcry, just as there is here to-day. There was a time when the grazing land was used without any charge whatever, and this was done so long that the people out there came to think they had a vested right in it and that the Government of the United States had no right to make a charge of any amount. For a number of years a small charge has been made. There has been an outcry whenever it has been suggested that that amount be increased. There has been some dispute here as to the amounts charged at this time. At page 541 of the hearings the Forester tells us that the average paid for cattle is 72 cents a year, the average for sheep 12 cents a year, and the average for horses 90 cents a year. He was asked how those charges compared with the charges made for similar facilities on similar lands owned by private parties.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho rose.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I shall not yield now. He was asked how those charges compared with similar pasturage charges made by private interests, and he said they are only a small part of rates and charges made by owners of private lands. I do not undertake to quote his exact language, but when asked why he did not increase the charges he said they had started on a policy there, and that it would be disagreeable to change it and that they did not like to do it.

When asked whether he thought the rate should be increased he replied that he did, and when asked further why he did not do it he replied that they would not do it unless Congress directed that it should be done, unless a new policy should be adopted. The paragraph of the bill we are considering does not provide for an increase of rates. It simply provides that the Secretary of Agriculture shall be authorized to make an investigation to get information, so that he may later determine, in his discretion, whether or not the rates should be raised—for the purpose of ascertaining the appraised value of pasturage upon the national forests, which appraised value, when determined, may, in the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture, be made the basis of the charge for grazing permits upon such forests.

I venture to say there will be no increase of rates during the life of the permits now outstanding, but the investigation must be made now if we are to have the information when these permits terminate that will justify the Secretary of Agriculture in acting understandingly in fixing rates for a future period. All we are asking is that the Secretary of Agriculture shall make the investigation, so that he may have the information upon which a change of rates may be made if, in his discretion, a change will be found to be necessary. That is all this legislation is for.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield now?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. There is no question in the world but that the rates now charged are but a quarter to one-tenth as much as are charged on similar areas—not on the highly cultivated areas, where the pasture and all conditions are much more favorable, but on similar areas owned by private parties. We are not asking that rates be increased now or during the life of outstanding permits, but we ask that the Secretary of Agriculture be authorized to make the investigation.

Some gentlemen tell us the Secretary now has authority, I do not know whether he has or not. Some may know more about that. We often find men who are not on a committee, having had no opportunity, it being none of their business to make investigation, who know or assume to know more than do members of the committee. I do not know whether or not the Secretary of Agriculture has the authority now. But I do know, following interviews with officials who have charge of these properties and whose duty it is know and give information respecting them, that the investigation will not be made unless it is specifically directed and authorized by law just as we propose in this clause in the bill.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I suggest that the provision should remain as the House passed it, and that the Secretary shall have the authority to obtain, and that he be directed to obtain, the information so that if it is found proper to use it as a basis for increases we will have the information and all data on which the work can understandingly be done. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman moves the previous question on the motion to further insist on a disagreement to the Senate amendment.

The question was taken, and the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question first comes on the motion of the gentleman from Idaho to recede and concur in the Senate amendment.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided, and there were—ayes 62, noes 55.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. It is clear that there is no quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 134, nays 146, not voting 147, as follows:

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present, the Doorkeeper will unlock the doors. The question recurs on the motion of the gentleman from Iowa that the House further insist on its disagreement.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RUBEY. Does not the fact that this motion was defeated make the adoption of the other unnecessary?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman's point is correct in that refusing to recede and concur is the same as disagreeing.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I wish to submit a request for unanimous consent that my colleague, Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee, may be excused on account of serious illness in his family.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, leave is granted.

There was no objection.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. EVANS of Nevada. Mr. Speaker, owing to restrictions under which the stock grower operates upon the national forest reserves, the rate should be not more than one-half that imposed upon private lands in similar localities. On the forest reserves only a certain number of head are allowed under any one permit, with no control of certain areas. He may be moved upon scant notice from section to section, with only expectation for temporary privilege. Other stock owners are allowed range with his, when in charge of a herder. The stockman has no say. All is decided by Government men. The stockman has no immediate redress against trespass from other herds. He must sign to move on demand.

Under these restrictions the Government may eject him at any time. He has no definite tenure of the land and can not wisely invest to increase his herd, thus creating an uncertain future, where he should have protection of contract covering many years. He can not sell or transfer his brand with assurance to the purchaser for continuance of pasturage. He can not incorporate without being subjected to a revision and possible curtailment of area for selling a portion of his holdings, by which he may forfeit all his grazing privileges; he may not even temporarily reside elsewhere. He is restricted and can not change from one class of stock to another kind, and subject to reduction to admit new stockmen; subjected to numerous countings, roundings up, and disturbances. He must allow all others in that section full use of any and all improvements which he has privately made, and seldom is he permitted to fence, while use of his expensive efforts at improving the land is apportioned to others. Forest ranges are long distances from winter feed and shipping points, and the meat producers must often give way to game animals. His permit is not negotiable nor transferable.

The exactions of dehorning, salting requirements, bull laws, percentage of steers and breeding stock, and building sheds are senseless and too many. It is not a right, but a temporary personal privilege, subject to revision, restraint, or instant cancellation. These restrictions are necessary for protection of general stock and all interests, and are cited to show the disadvantages to the stockman as compared to using private lands in the same vicinity, where he has recognized rights upon which he may base a continuance of stability and growth of his business, and where he may protect his herd with fences. Your great aim is increased production, but exorbitant fees added to many impractical barriers tend to defeat this purpose.

For these valid reasons range fees should be not arbitrarily increased, but permitted to stand as encouragement to production by stabilizing a just rate to remain for many years.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks on the grazing amendment.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LEE of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia makes the same request. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington makes the same request. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I move to further insist on disagreement to amendment 249.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede on Senate amendment 249, and concur in the amendment with an amendment striking out, beginning at line 11, and including all of line 11 down to and including line 20.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas moves that the House recede from its disagreement to Senate amendment 249, and concur therein with an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 92, line 11, strike out all of lines 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, and 20.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I offer a preferential motion.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following motion, namely, that the House instruct the conferees——

Mr. MANN of Illinois. That motion is not in order now.

Mr. STEVENSON. I offer as a substitute for the gentleman's motion, that the House concur in the amendment striking out the language which the gentleman indicates to strike out, and insert the language which I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina offers as a substittue for the amendment of the gentleman from Texas an amendment which he submits, and which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

That hereafter whenever demand is made for delivery, or a tender of delivery is made, of cotton classified as tenderable on a section 5 contract of said act as amended by the act of March 4, 1919, the buyer shall have a right to designate five of the grades, tenderable under the amendment of March 4, 1919, and from which 50 per cent of said contracts shall be delivered, the seller to determine the number of bales of each grade, if any, which he will deliver, and the seller shall have the option to deliver the other 50 per cent of the contract in any of the 10 grades tenderable under the amendment of March 4, 1919.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I make a preferential motion. I move to concur in the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee moves that the House recede and concur in the Senate amendment.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that that motion is not preferential. At this stage a motion to recede and concur with an amendment is preferable to a motion to concur.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The gentleman will not make that point of order if he thinks a moment.

Mr. CRISP. I have thought a moment, and I still make that motion, because I think that is the rule of the House.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, a motion to concur with an amendment takes precedence before the stage of disagreement has been reached. When the Senate amendment is first before the House a motion to concur with an amendment has precedence.

Mr. CRISP. The gentleman is correct. I am in error.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I think the motion to concur with an amendment as reported probably referred to the lining of the amendment as in the bill with the Senate amendment numbered. If so, it ought to be stated. Of course, that is not the Senate amendment and not printed.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, my motion is to strike out the lines on page 92 of the bill printed with the Senate amendment, from 11 to 20 inclusive, and insert the matter which I sent to the desk to be read in lieu of it.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I have no objection to the form of the motion.

Mr. STEVENSON. That is why I am stating it. The gentleman is entirely correct. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STEVENSON. I am using the bill H. R. 12272, on which it says "Ordered to be printed with the amendments of the Senate numbered," dated March 29, 1920. If that is not the proper record, I would like to get it, so that we can have it in at the right place.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. It is likely that the enrolling clerk will take notice of it.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] that the House recede and concur.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I understand that the motion of the gentleman from South Carolina is, in substance, the same, and therefore I withdraw my motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee withdraws his motion. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON].

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, several requests have been made for time, and if I may have the gentleman's attention, I will ask him if we can agree on the time.

Mr. LEE of Georgia. I have requests for an hour and a half from gentlemen over here, some on one side and some on the other side of the question, aggregating about 45 minutes for the amendment and about 45 minutes against it.

Mr. HAUGEN. Can not that time be cut down somewhat? Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the time be extended 1 hour and 20 minutes, to be equally divided for and against the proposition, with the gentleman from Georgia in control of half the time, and myself in control of the other half.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the debate on this motion be extended 1 hour and 20 minutes.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The debate on this amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair supposed it was on both amendments.

Mr. HAUGEN. On this amendment and all amendments thereto.

The SPEAKER. On the Senate amendments, half to be controlled by the gentleman from Iowa and half to be controlled by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LEE]. Is there objection?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, this is perhaps one of the most important matters that could concern a great section of the United States. This amendment comes over from the Senate. I understand that there was very little consideration of it there, and I do not believe the matter can be discussed here in that length of time, and therefore I ask that we have at least 1 hour and 30 minutes' discussion.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Would the gentleman ask the Speaker again to state the unanimous-consent request proposed by the gentleman from Iowa, the chairman of the committee? There is some confusion as to what his request was.

The SPEAKER. The request is that there be 1 hour and 20 minutes' debate.

Mr. HAUGEN. I amend that, and make it 1 hour and 30 minutes, with the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LEE] to control half the time, and I the other half, with the understanding that the time is to be equally divided among gentlemen for and against.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the debate be extended to 1 hour and 30 minutes, one half the time to be controlled by himself and the other half by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LEE]. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEE of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. YOUNG].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. HARRELD. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the amendment be again reported.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to having the amendment again reported? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The amendment will be again reported.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, there is at this time sought to be enacted into law on an annual appropriation bill a proposition that involves the destiny of more than 3,000,000 people who produce the great cotton crop of the South, which not only sustains those people themselves, but as the product of their labor goes forth to the uttermost parts of the world to clothe humanity. It is not a proposition that is confined in its final analysis to the cotton producer, but it goes to every consumer of cotton, to every manufacturing enterprise in the whole Nation, and to every manufacturing enterprise in the other nations of the earth.

This amendment is an amendment that has had no consideration. It was put on in the Senate without debate, with not half a dozen Senators present. So far as I am concerned, I want the country to know that men who should have been present when so important a proposition as this was presented and asked to be made permanent law were not in their seats. Then it comes back through the conference committee to be considered by this House.

What do you know about it? It is a technical proposition. Take it from me, it touches the value of every pound of cotton that is produced in this Nation. It touches the direct interest of every citizen of this Nation. Are you going to assume the responsibility of changing a law that did have consideration by this body and by the other body and write onto it a fundamental change, whereof no man in the universe knows what the legal effect will be and what the practical working out will be? You are not going to do it.

Ah, there has been propaganda shot from one end of this country to the other, whole pages of newspaper advertising, paid for by the author of this amendment, in orden to make sentiment for the amendment. The author of the amendment is a manufacturer. I am a producer. At the end of this Congress I am going to engage actively in the production of cotton and, if I had my way about it, when this product comes from my farm, I want it to go out into the market of the world controlled as nearly as may be by the laws of supply and demand. That is all I want as a farmer. [Applause.] I am going back to produce this great article, and I do not want a fictitious law affecting it placed upon the statute books, a law of doubtful effect, so doubtful that I do not know how it is going to affect the value of the product that I expect to devote the rest of my life to producing.

Now, what have we got? We have got in this country two great cotton exchanges—one at New York and one at New Orleans. If I could substitute a better system than we have, God knows I would drive out of the markets for all agricultural products the gambling enterprises that have entered into them. [Applause.]

But that has not been found practicable. We had this condition. We had these two great exchanges. In 1914 this matter came before the Committee on Agriculture of the House, to determine whether or not we could pass a law that would regulate these exchanges and make them conform to a rule that would require a fair, practical, common-sense way of handling a great industry. They had engaged in transactions that were damnable. They had been used to handling the great cotton crop of the country through these exchanges by gathering together thousands of bales of dog-tail cotton and holding it in their warehouses, and when cotton was bought and sold on these exchanges they would come in under the rules and regulations and tender this dog-tail cotton, which is not spinnable and which has no value, and yet under their rules they could tender it and pay the difference. If I entered the game with them and bought a hundred bales of cotton and I did not settle according to their rules, they would tender me this unspinnable stuff. They would force me to take it. I would be forced to settle according to their rules and on their terms. We said, "That ought not to be."

What did we do? We had hearings, as they ought to have had on this amendment. Those hearings lasted for days and weeks. Whom did we have before us? We had men from both exchanges. We had producers, manufacturers, and dealers of this Nation. They all came and testified as to the conditions in the cotton trade, with their recommendations as to what should be done. Now, this was a duly authorized committee of the House, presided over by Mr. Lever, an ex-Member whom we all honor. I was on that committee. So, after hearing these facts, we debated in that committee for many days as to what could be done, and what was the principle that we had to keep in mind. The principle was to let this cotton go to the markets of the world as nearly as possible governed by the law of supply and demand, and take it out of the power of manipulating organizations like these exchanges were at that time to tender unspinnable cotton in order to win in their part of the game.

We said, and we said it advisedly, that there are certain standard grades of cotton that are spinnable, and after all the facts were developed we said there were 10 of those grades of spinnable cotton, cotton that is of real value, cotton that the world wants, cotton that the world demands, that will always sell in the market. We adopted 10 grades, middling being the basis, and five above and five below. Middling is the real measuring yardstick. After that became a law it worked out to the reasonable satisfaction not only of the trade but of the producers. It took from the crooked dealers on the exchanges the power that they had had theretofore of tendering thousands of bales of cotton that was not cotton at all, but waste that they had warehoused somewhere probably for 50 years for that nefarious purpose. Now when they deal on the exchanges they are dealing in those 10 spinnable grades of cotton. We are regulating them and making them deal in an article that has value.

Well, when the law went down here to be administered in——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. I should like five minutes more.

Mr. LEE of Georgia. I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. The chief of the Bureau of Markets extended those grades until they reached 21 in number. We thought we had limited them to 10. Then what happened? These exchanges were rapidly getting back to the same system that we sought to correct by the original legislation. Then what did we do? We put as a rider on the wheat bill these four lines that I have asked to have remain in this bill as permanent law. All it means is to restore and hold to the 10 grades as originally provided in the cotton-futures act.

Now, what does this amendment sent over here by the Senate mean? Do you know? It says you shall hold to the 10 grades all right, but the seller has got the right to deliver middling and five grades above, and the other party to the contract can deliver any grade he pleases, any of the 10 grades. Do you know what effect it will have on the market? I do not know. Have there been any hearings that would develop that fact? It would have been developed if there had been any hearings. Has there been any witness examined before any committee of the House? They would not have got by me without cross-questioning so that I would know how far-reaching this proposition is. Yet they seek to write it on this bill when we do not know its effects. I say to you, I do not know what it is going to do, and all of the Members of Congress, equally interested in doing right, do not want to guess at any such proposition, which may have an effect that we do not intend. My State produces one-third of the entire cotton crop of the South. I think I can pledge you here that the 18 Members from Texas do not want to experiment with this legislation. If there is merit in it we want it to go through the committee channels, and to have hearings on it. Why do you want to get away from a system that has been reasonably satisfactory? There may be something better. I do not know. The present law has worked so much better than the old system that I have been reasonably satisfied with it and my people have, and I do not want to swap that off for something that I do not know the effect of. I appeal to you gentlemen from the noncotton sections of the country to be fair to us. If there is merit in the Comer amendment, Congress is still in session and will continue to be in session. Let it be introduced as a separate bill and go through the regular channel of a committee. Then if there is merit in it you and I will be glad to adopt the amendment as a separate bill, but for God's sake do not try to experiment on a permanent law which has proven its worth. [Applause.]

I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. HAUGEN. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS].

Mr. LEE of Georgia. I had agreed to yield 10 minutes first to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON].

Mr. SIMS. I am glad to give way to the gentleman.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, I am glad that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. YOUNG] went fully into the history of this legislation, because it relieves me of part of my duty in presenting to you the reasons why some of us are in favor of the substitute which I have offered for the Comer amendment.

The gentleman says this is a vicious proposition, to put something of this kind on this bill, and yet you will notice, gentlemen, that his motion proposes to keep on this bill and make permanent law something that was put onto the Lever wheat regulation bill just as this is being put on here now. If it is vicious now, it was vicious then.

The gentleman also says a good deal about cotton futures and about the exchanges. My proposition is to put the buyer and the seller absolutely on the same ground and give each one of them the right to say, to a certain extent, what his contract shall mean. The gentleman [Mr. YOUNG of Texas] says he comes from the State which makes one-third of the cotton. I come from the State which makes more cotton to the head and more cotton to the acre than any other State in the cotton belt. Take the statistics of 1918, the last complete crop statistics, and they show that Texas planted 11,233,000 acres of cotton and she got 2,610,000 bales. South Carolina planted 3,001,000 acres and she got 1,581,000 bales. In other words, we make over half a bale to the acre, while Texas makes about a bale to every five acres.

That is about the proposition, so there is nothing in that. We know something about making cotton in South Carolina, and it stands away yonder and above any other State in the number of bales per acre.

Now, you gentlemen know, and if you do not I will read to you, what the grades are. When a man goes into the New York or New Orleans market he buys middling cotton; that is, it is bought on the basis that they are going to deliver middling cotton. There are 10 grades that can be tendered—middling fair, strict good middling, good middling, strict middling, middling, strict low middling, low middling, good middling tinge yellow, strict middling tinge yellow, good middling yellow stain.

There are 10 grades—5 above middling and 5 below. The proposition here is this: When a demand is made for delivery and when the seller undertakes to deliver, the man who buys can say, "Here are 10 grades that you can make delivery from." As it is now the seller can deliver all of it in low grade. He does not need it; he does not want it; but they can make him take it whether he wants it or not. My proposition is that when he comes to deliver he can say, "Here are five grades, and you can deliver 50 per cent of it from those five grades." You have got to deliver 50 per cent in any of these five grades. And he says to the seller that he can deliver the balance—he is not compelled to deliver the balance—in those other grades, but he can deliver in any or all of the 10 grades that are deliverable. Is not that clear? We do not ask for anything that is unfair. What will be the result? It means that the purchaser is put on a parity with the seller and that he has the right to say what grade half of the cotton shall be, and the seller has a right to say what the other half shall be, and that is all there is to it.

Why do we do that? I will tell you why. They sold last year on the exchange 104,000,000 bales of cotton. How many bales of cotton were there to sell? Eleven million. They never expected to deliver that cotton. They sold it at 3 cents a pound below the price of spot cotton every day in the year. Why did they do it?

Now, I want to show you what this amounts to. Take the cotton market of yesterday. In New York July cotton sold at 38.50 and spot cotton at 41.40—2.90 more for spot; and this cotton they are selling to deliver in July. There is not a pound of cotton that can be made between now and July to be delivered. The cotton that can be delivered is already in existence. Cotton is going up from day to day, and the result is that it is absurd that it can be kept down to 38.50 in July; but they are relying on the fact that nobody will come up and ask for the delivery of cotton because they can give them what they do not want.

We propose to say to them, "You have got to deliver 50 bales of the 100 bales of cotton of the grade the purchaser wants, and you can put any of the other stuff on to him that you want to." We are going to give each man the right to say what the contract shall be paid in. You say that is a gambling proposition? It is. Some say that this will destroy the value of the low-grade cotton and that there is more low-grade cotton than there is high grade.

I will cite you Hester's report. There were five grades below and five above. There was so much more above that it held the average up to middling. What effect does that have? I make cotton, and I know where it hits, because I have seen it hit. About two years ago spot cotton was selling at, say, 26 cents a pound, and you could not get it for any less. In the New York market they were selling it in April at 22 cents a pound for delivery in July—4 cents difference. We are loaning money to farmers, loaning them 20 cents a pound upon it; but the banks say that you loan too much on that, and that they can not carry it, that they must have 5 cents margin. We say to them, "Here is spot cotton bringing 26 cents," and they reply, "But here is the New York market for July, and that is 90 days from now, and when you come to sell that cotton to pay this note it is only 22, and, therefore, you lack 3 cents, and you have not enough margin, and you can not discount your paper here." The farmer has to put up enough cotton to make it only 17 cents a pound, because these gamblers have bet on its being lower in July than it is now. That is the reason that I say that the farmer is interested in this, and I am speaking from the standpoint of the farmer. I am also speaking from the standpoint of the manufacturer. I hear people abusing the manufacturer and saying that the author of this is a manufacturer. If we find a manufacturer who is going to help the farmer out, then, I say, God save him. I say that he is a benefactor. He has been in my country, where we are the third in the United States in the manufacture of cotton.

Let us look for one minute at another thing.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HICKS). The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has expired.

Mr. STEVENSON. Can not the gentleman let me have five minutes more?

Mr. LEE of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. ALMON] is willing to yield three minutes of his time to the gentleman from South Carolina, which I grant to him now.

Mr. STEVENSON. I thank the gentleman. They say that there will be no market for the low-grade cotton; that it will hurt the market for the low-grade cotton. If it comes to hurting the market for low-grade cotton by making them give the man who buys an equal share with the man who sells, why it will have to be hurt, and I will show you that there is nothing to that. Let us see what they tender through the cotton exchanges. Do you know how much cotton has been tendered and delivered in the cotton exchanges in the last year? One hundred and four million bales were sold, and there were 20,000 bales delivered in New Orleans and less than 10,000 bales delivered in New York.

They talk about it destroying low-grade cotton! They delivered of middling and above, 15,565 bales, and they delivered of below middling 5,179 bales, so that the low-grade cotton is not finding any considerable outlet through the exchange at the present time. Therefore they are unduly alarmed over that. But let us see what becomes of it. This country spins 6,000,000 bales in round numbers, not quite that last year. It exports the balance. Germany has been out of the market, and Germany and Austria took 3,000,000 bales in the last year that they were in the market. They are coming back in. They take the low-grade cotton—all of it. They will take at least 5,000,000 bales next year if they can get it. There are only 11,000,000 bales made. There is a good deal of the low grade consumed in this country. There is not over 50 per cent of it, according to the secretary of the exchange in New Orleans, that is low grade. Three million bales of it will go to Germany and the balance of it goes abroad, and there is a cry for it. We have not near enough of cotton to export, and only using five to six million bales here, there is no danger of any clogging, because the manufacturers can call these fellows if they want to, for high-grade cotton, for middling and above, for the whole 6,000,000, and have a million bales left, according to the best figures that I can get; but they do not do it. They say they go out on the market and buy it. All I want is a square deal for the people who have something to sell, and not have the men in a position where, by dominating the market and dictating to the buyer what he shall take, they can keep the price of this great business product 3 cents a pound below what it is when you buy spot, and when there is absolutely no chance to get any more to deliver, when I called your attention to the July figures as I did a little bit ago.

There is another thing about this—talking about the low grades that they are afraid will be hurt. The Southern Cotton Association sold 700,000 bales to Bohemia alone——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has again expired.

By unanimous consent Mr. STEVENSON was granted leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS].

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, for years I took an active part in trying to secure legislation to prevent gambling in the name of cotton to the injury of the cotton industry. There was no more active man in the part played in that attempted legislation then than the gentleman from Texas, the Hon. Albert Sidney Burleson, and the hearings covered many volumes. Texas was highly in favor of the legislation proposed in order to minimize the pure gambling that went on in the name of cotton on the exchanges. Talk about hedging! If there was no gambling in cotton, there would not be any need for hedging. The actual dealers have got to hedge now, because the gambling is done in such a way as to affect the market for spot cotton. In the morning the cotton exchange opens at 10 o'clock, and they sell right along for every month for a year or so on the opening call.

Selling futures goes on until 2 o'clock in the afternoon, and then spots are quoted, and the usual quotation is "asked and bid" prices. So much asked, so much bid; sales, none. When thousands of bales of phantom cotton have been sold that very morning prior to these spot quotations, these quotations of futures for every month in the year go out to the country by wire immediately, and all that day at the little country towns and everywhere else where there is a telephone connection actual cotton is bought upon the price of futures that are made in New York that day. It is too late when the spots are quoted to do any spot business that day. Why is there not a future market in wool? Wool and cotton are used very much for the same purposes. Both are used for making clothing, fabrics, and many things of a similar sort, but there are no future contract markets for wool—no wool exchanges. You do not see quotations, October, December, or May wool, yet there are future contracts with reference to both wool and woolen goods; but the wool is bought in good faith, and business in wool and woolens goes on and prospers. Now, if the fabric that is used very largely for the same thing as cotton requires no future market and no hedging, then why does cotton require it in a phantom gamblers' market in which hundreds of thousands of bales are sold; and when you come to a delivery, it is always the delivery of cotton which no man wants, not even the man who has it. Why talk of delivering cotton when hundreds and thousands of bales are sold in the morning and bought back that afternoon? Why, these gamblers in cotton are afraid to trust each other frequently over one day, consequently on Saturday, when the cotton future market closes for one day, professionals close out, not wanting to carry the risk until Monday following. Does that look like dealing as a measure of insurance? Now, the proposition of the gentleman from South Carolina in substance, as he stated, is the half-and-half proposition. If you sell for future delivery, and you must deliver some of the grades mentioned of the ten, why not give the purchaser the right to have deliveries of half of the kind of cotton he wants, while you give the sellers the right to deliver the other half of the kind he may desire to deliver? Therefore I think, if you care anything for the cotton-producing industry and the manufacture of cotton, you will vote for the substitute amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LEE of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS]. [Applause.]

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, with all due respect to you, you know about as much about this subject as Adam's house cat, and the gentleman who just talked to you about this technical subject has really contributed as much to your information as would have been done if he had talked altogether in Greek. [Laughter.] This is a very technical subject, and the argument which the gentleman from South Carolina has made is the very best possible reason that can be assigned why this whole subject ought to go to a committee to have hearings by those who favor it and those who are opposed to it, to be thrashed out and brought into the House in an orderly fashion instead of coming up as it does. Why, this is not the last crop of cotton that is going to be made. There is no occasion for this unseemly hurry. The distinguished author of this amendment stops over in Washington between trains. He is in a hurry. He rushes up to the Capitol, assuring us that he has got a prescription that will make the world safe for the cotton consumer and the cotton producer. [Laughter.] "Do not call any witnesses, do not have any hearings, do not make any investigation; I have not got time for that, gentlemen; I have to catch the next train for Alabama." [Laughter and applause.] Just as well undertake to legislate, gentlemen, with a ouija board as to deal with a serious subject in such fashion as this. [Laughter and applause.] There never was a time in the history of this generation when the cotton farmer was getting as good price as he is for his cotton. There never was a time when the cotton spinner was making a more satisfactory dividend. Then why monkey with the situation when everybody is happy? This is exactly on the plane of the boy who cuts his mechanical toy to pieces to see why the wheels go round and why it runs so smoothly. There is just as much sense in one as there would be in the other. [Laughter.] The gentlemen here who represent the overwhelming acreage of the South earnestly beg you not to legislate in any such haphazard way as this on a matter so vital to the cotton trade, but let the gentleman from South Carolina, who produces more per acre than anybody else, and the gentleman from Tennessee, who does not produce any per acre [laughter], and the distinguished Senator from Alabama, when he can come back on a visit and has got a little longer to stay, and the gentleman from Texas and myself, and the rest of us all go to the Committee on Agriculture and present our various views and have the producer present and give him a square deal—the gentleman from South Carolina says that is what he wants, a square deal—give him a hearing; give the manufacturer a hearing and give the gentlemen on the exchanges a hearing, and thrash it out and then bring in a proposition, submit it to the House, when somebody will know something about it. I submit that that is the only way to legislate on a matter that affects vitally so many people of this country. Why, the gentleman from South Carolina is not satisfied with the Comer amendment. He wants to change that somewhat. He has got a substitute for the Comer amendment. So the Senator from Alabama and the gentleman from South Carolina do not agree on what ought to be done. Let us relegate them to the Committee on Agriculture in the House and the Committee on Agriculture in the Senate, where they can thrash out their differences. I hope, gentlemen, you will not be induced to support this simply because you are told that the Postmaster General favors it.

Mr. SIMS. To save time, the gentleman himself favors it.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. No; I am utterly opposed to it. If the House is interested in knowing what my view is, I think it is absolutely vicious, but that is simply my opinion. I have not the time to discuss the merits of it. I simply appeal to you not to take any action here at all; do not write it on the statute books until all of us have an opportunity to appear before the proper committee. Why, I could retort that the gentleman from South Carolina, Mr. Lever, is utterly opposed to the Comer amendment, and I dare say his opinion is worth as much, with reference to this subject, as the opinion of the Postmaster General. I hope, gentlemen, that you will not write this into the bill. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HAUGEN. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER].

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Speaker, since the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS] has alluded to the author of the amendment in the Senate, it may be proper for me to say that while it is true he will be in the Senate for a short time only, yet he only asked for this short term, and I am of the opinion had he asked for a longer term the people of Alabama would have awarded it to him. He has enjoyed for many years the confidence, the esteem, and the warm affection of the people of my State, and when I refer to the people of my State I refer especially to the great farmer class of our people. He was railroad commissioner for many years, and under his direction, while commissioner, far-reaching and beneficent legislation was secured in the reduction of rates, both passenger and freight. He made a great governor and was elected to that high office by an overwhelming vote of the farmers of the State, and no administration contributed so much to the cause of education as did his. He caused to be placed on the statute books liberal revenue laws, taxing the man of means, and he is a man of means himself. No one who knows him would question for a moment his friendship for the cotton producer, and his absolute sincerity and honesty of purpose in the preparation of this amendment offered by him in the Senate. He is a large producer, a large dealer, and a large manufacturer of cotton. Able, stalwart, frank, and honest in his private and public life, he never yet has taken a position without announcing his reasons therefor, willing always that those who differ from him shall be given an opportunity to meet and answer any argument he may offer in support of his position. He and the distinguished Senator from Louisiana, you will note from the RECORD, have had long and interesting discussions of this amendment, both giving reasons for their respective positions, and I venture to assert that if you will read their discussions the majority of you will agree that the Senator from Alabama is right.

The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS] states this is a most technical subject, and though he and others refer to it as being so technical and say you know nothing about it, yet they have frequently come to you for legislation in reference to it.

There was a time, and that time was not long ago, when, as all now admit, gamblers on the cotton exchange had for years been protected in methods used for fleecing producers, honest dealers, and manufacturers of cotton. They had been given the right in the fulfillment of contracts made on the exchange to tender any kind of cotton, and thus they were enabled to press down the prices of this great staple. In the effort to correct this abuse Congress first limited the tenderable grades on exchange contracts to 21. It was soon found that speculative traders on the exchange could under the law tender badly mixed lots of low-grade cotton within these 21 grades and thereby in a large way depress the price of cotton. Congress then, seeking to further check and correct this abuse, limited the tenderable grades to 10 on exchange contracts.

It has been clearly shown that even with this limitation speculators on the exchange market are yet able to assemble unusable and unmarketable mixed lots of cotton within these 10 grades for tender and thus with safety and impunity constantly cause wide fluctuations between the exchange and commercial value of cotton. The reason why cotton is not now forced to much lower levels by the speculators on the exchange is the grim determination of holders of spot cotton not to sell when these fluctuations occur.

Many have been the vicious attacks of the gamblers on the exchange to push down the price of spot cotton within the last five or six months by causing wide differences between the exchange and the commercial value of cotton. Their efforts have failed only because of the ability of holders of spots not to sell their holdings when these onslaughts of speculators occur. The law as it now exists invites overselling and makes it easy for the speculator, who thus oversells to protect himself from loss.

The time allotted me will not permit a full and detailed discussion of this subject, but I invite those who seek information to read the able speeches made by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. COMER] and which have lately appeared in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

It is not surprising that no one has to-day been bold enough to defend the existing law on this subject, and all seem content to simply urge that the amending of the law be postponed until the Committee on Agriculture in the House can hold extended hearings and submit a bill seeking to correct the shortcomings and dangers that have been pointed out. Let me call your attention to this and ask the distinguished gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS], who seems satisfied with existing law, why it is that before the war the difference between middling, strict low middling, and low middling varied only from 50 to 100 points, and now under the present tenderable 10-grade law, which he seems to think very excellent, there is a variation of 350 points between middling and strict low middling and about 800 points between middling and low middling?

Mr. JUUL. Will the gentleman permit me to ask a question?

Mr. OLIVER. My time is so limited I regret that I must decline to yield.

This wide difference between middling, strict low middling, and low middling now exists, and, what is more, cotton not within the 10 tenderable grades has been selling for a higher price than grades which are tenderable under existing law. This certainly shows that the existing law has many shortcomings and offers no protection to the legitimate trader in exchange contracts, whether he be buyer or seller, and that the gambler is still able with impunity to cause wide fluctuations, thus holding down and constantly threatening to press to lower levels the commercial value of cotton.

Permit me to cite one other instance showing the dangers and the gambler's opportunity under existing law. On February 20 of this year March cotton was quoted on the New York exchange around 35 cents, while the spot market was then many points in advance of this exchange price. On March 25 the spot market was around 43 cents, and yet the May and July exchange contract value was around 37. This shows clearly that under the existing law the exchange value does not reflect, as it should, the commercial value of cotton. The exchange creates no value and adds no value, but it should be a true index to the commercial value of cotton, and the law should be so written that prices could not be manipulated on the exchange as I have shown they are.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. YOUNG] correctly stated that supply and demand make the value of cotton, and the only mistake he makes is in not now consenting to assist in passing this amendment, which will tend to stabilize the market and make the exchange price approximate and truly reflect the commercial value of cotton, which is, and should always be, determined by supply and demand.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes more to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. OLIVER. Some of the gentlemen who are now opposing this amendment readily concede that under the 10-grade tenderable law speculating sellers on the exchange can collect for tender a mixed lot of different types, within the 10 grades permitted, which can not be sold to legitimate users and manufacturers of cotton. They do assemble under existing law these mixed lots that are not commercially usable. One of the gentlemen to whom I refer suggested that he thought the present law should be at once amended so as to require the seller on the exchange to deliver not less than 25 of any one type on an exchange contract.

Now, this amendment is perfectly clear. It simply seeks to give to the buyer of an exchange contract the right to require one-half of the contract to be tendered in grades of his selection, within the 10 tenderable grades, leaving to the seller the right to tender one-half of the contract in grades of his selection, within the tenderable 10 grades. If this amendment is adopted, you will find that it will serve at once to make the exchange contract the index to the commercial value of cotton, and it will no longer be possible for the gambler on the exchange to fix for future months a price from three to five points lower than the present commercial value of cotton. No one has undertaken, and I venture to say no one will undertake, to defend the present law or to show why it is unfair and unjust to give to the buyer of a contract the right to select one half of the grades within the legal tenderable limit, the seller to have the option to select the other half.

This amendment has been given close study by Mr. Wannamaker, president of the Cotton States' Association, and he unreservedly indorses it. The commissioner of agriculture in Georgia strongly urges its adoption, so does the commissioner of agriculture in Alabama. Under leave to extend I insert a telegram from W. L. Brown, of Lawrenceville, Ga.

LAWRENCEVILLE, GA., April 24, 1920.

I have studied the Comer amendment restricting the delivery of cotton on future contracts, whereby the seller will be required to deliver 50 per cent middling and better. As a practical, legitimate spot-cotton dealer, I heartily favor the amendment. This amendment will tend to eliminate the short selling of future contracts by the large cotton gamblers, who deal exclusively in future-cotton contracts. Any legislation that will make it difficult for these future-contract cotton gamblers to make deliveries will, in my honest judgment, benefit the producers to a great extent. We have two classes of sellers of cotton—the one selling against his actual holdings of spot cotton, the other the fellow who sells the market short. The short seller is the enemy of the cotton farmer, the spot-cotton dealer, the banker, and the entire cotton-producing South. When he sells the market short he then throws his reputation as a great financier, commercial giant, and student of economics full force against the market to beat it down to the very lowest point possible, so that he may be able to buy in his contracts at a great profit to himself. This is no guesswork with me. Having been actually engaged in the business of buying and selling spot cotton for the past 12 years, I know whereof I speak.

As stated above, I have studied the Comer amendment thoroughly and will frankly say that I believe it to be a good measure for every southern Congressman and Senator to support and enact into law.

W. L. BROWN.

In conclusion, I venture to predict that if Congress now fails to adopt this amendment you will find that the producers of cotton will demand its adoption, and untold loss may follow as a result of your delay to now amend existing law so as to guard against the dangers, pitfalls, and shortcomings which the Senator from Alabama has so clearly and forcibly pointed out. Pride of authorship should not cause delay in the adoption of a wise amendment to protect or guard the cotton interests of the South. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HICKS). The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I ask the same privilege.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, the Senate amendment provides that "The amendments relating to cotton provided for in section 6 of the act known as the wheat-guaranty act, approved March 4, 1919, are hereby recognized and declared to be permanent legislation; that hereafter each lot of cotton classified as tenderable in whole or in part on a section 5 contract of said act as amended," shall be so-and-so. Now, what is "the said act"? "The said act" is the wheat-guaranty act. Of course, that is not what is intended. The criticism that I make of this is equally applicable to the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON], and only shows the hasty carelessness with which both amendments were prepared. They refer to one act and mean an entirely different act, and if this should be enacted as it stands there could be no enforcement of it in any court of law, because there is no "section 5" relating to cotton futures in the wheat-guaranty act.

I might refer to another provision in this which says that "Hereafter each lot of cotton classified as tenderable shall give to the buyer the right to demand one-half of the contract"; that a lot of cotton shall give to the buyer the right to demand something—foolish language, meaning nothing. I have no criticism of that. [Laughter.] Everybody, preparing amendments hastily, having in mind what they want, frequently do not put it in language.

But here is a case where the form of the language is of intense and intricate importance, dealing with highly technical matters. I am not prepared to vote in favor of a proposition dealing with such highly technical matters, about which I know nothing myself, until it has been carefully examined and scanned and reported upon by a committee of this body. [Applause.]

It is perfectly idle for us to say that we personally understand it, at least on this side of the House. The gentlemen from the cotton-growing States do not agree. They did agree, and we passed their cotton-futures act on an Agricultural appropriation bill. Then we amended it on a wheat-guaranty bill, because apparently they agreed. We knew that we knew nothing about it, but we did not know at that time that they did not know about it. [Laughter.] Now they do not agree. Which one is right I do not know. You do not know. But before we enact legislation affecting the interests of the cotton growers throughout the country, affecting the interests of the consumers and manufacturers of cotton, affecting the interests of the people who wear cotton goods, somebody ought to know something about it. [Applause.]

I have listened with interest to the gentlemen who have spoken, but when they talked about what this meant I could not understand them, and I could not help wondering if they themselves understood. I say this with due deference, because I have great admiration for their ability, their intelligence, and their knowledge; but we over here can not afford to vote for a proposition of this kind that we do not know anything about, which we know by its form has been drawn carelessly, hastily, and without due consideration. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] has 25 minutes remaining, and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LEE] has 13 minutes remaining.

Mr. HAUGEN. I yield to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. SANDERS] five minutes.

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I listened with a great deal of satisfaction to the speech just made. When the so-called Comer amendment passed the Senate I read it the next morning. I have read it at least once every day since, and I state without any fear of successful contradiction that there is not a human being on earth, even the author of it, who knows what it means or what its effect will be. [Laughter.] It is susceptible of 27 different constructions.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Fifty-seven.

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. I am even willing to admit that it might mean 57 varieties. [Laughter.] To show you conclusively that no one can understand the Comer amendment, I need only refer to the fact that one of its strongest proponents in this House, the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON], after reading it and pondering over it, has tried to reduce it to clearer terms, and his effort in that direction has only made confusion worse confounded, as his amendment proves.

It goes without saying that legislation of this grave and important character ought not to be put through in any such manner as this.

I represent in part a cotton-growing district. It is my business to understand this amendment if I could. I can not. How, therefore, can I ask you to vote upon it? If I who represent a cotton constituency, who know something about the raising and the marketing of cotton, after due diligence and careful study am unable to arrive at some solution of what this amendment means, how can gentlemen who know nothing of the conditions arrive at a correct interpretation thereof?

Mr. McDUFFIE. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. I will, but I have mighty little time.

Mr. McDUFFIE. The gentleman does not mean to tell the House that he does not understand the terms of the substitute offered by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON]?

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. I am perfectly frank to say that I do not believe the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON] himself understands the effect of what he is trying to get this House to do, and if he did understand it—I say that with all due deference to my friend from South Carolina—I think he would be the very last man to propose it. [Laughter.]

Why, gentlemen, this is a proposition that ought not to be approached in any such style. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON] said that the proposition for 10 grades was put upon the wheat bill as a rider. He is mistaken. It was the thought-out result of what this House had tried to do some years ago, and therefore it was not a rider in the sense that what the House did was not well understood and thought that it had already accomplished by legislation.

I am in favor of the Young amendment, which leaves the law as it now stands, and am opposed to the other amendment. [Applause.]

Mr. LEE of Georgia. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. ALMON].

Mr. ALMON. Mr. Speaker, I indorse what my colleague [Mr. OLIVER] said in reference to the author of this amendment, Senator COMER, of Alabama. As has been said, Senator COMER enjoys the confidence, esteem, and respect of the people of Alabama. He is a successful producer and manufacturer of cotton, and I am sure that he is intensely interested and believes that this amendment of his is thoroughly in the interest of those who grow cotton in the South.

I am not responsible, and neither is the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON] nor the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER], for the fact that our distinguished friend from Louisiana [Mr. SANDERS] is unable to understand this amendment. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON] and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER] have explained this amendment in the very clearest and most unmistakable terms, and if the gentlemen who heard them do not understand what they mean by it that is their own fault and not the fault of the gentlemen who undertook to explain it.

My people are cotton growers. Every expression I have heard from my constituents is to the effect that this amendment is in the interest of those who raise cotton.

The only objections which I have heard raised to this amendment is that sufficient hearings have not been granted on this subject and that they do not know what effect it will have. The first objection only means delay in the enactment of this amendment.

The cotton-futures act and the amendments heretofore made by Congress to that act has all been in the interest of those who grow cotton. This amendment is another limitation on the action of the cotton exchanges and goes a long way toward forcing the exchanges to do the right, proper, and honest thing. I feel sure that this amendment will be of benefit to the people who raise cotton. The fact that the cotton exchanges in New York and New Orleans are opposed to this amendment makes me more firmly of the opinion that it is right and proper.

This amendment passed the Senate and has been debated at length in the Senate within the last few days, and it seems that everyone has been given an opportunity to consider the subject, and I see no reason for defeating this meritorious measure in the interest of the farmers of the South under the pretext that it should be delayed in order that extensive hearings might be granted before the committee of the House.

It is claimed that the price of cotton is good under the present law. While that is true, it is no reason why it would not be better if this amendment was enacted into law.

It is all buncombe, in my opinion, about this amendment injuring the value of the low-grade cotton. No reason has been given as to why that would happen.

If this amendment is defeated it will be not because it is not right and just but on the plea that it should be delayed until all parties are given a hearing before the Agricultural Committee of the House. I am firmly of the opinion that this proposed legislation is in the interest of the farmers who raise cotton and I favor it. The farmers who raise the cotton are the ones in whom I am interested and not those who gamble in the cotton exchanges. [Applause.]

Mr. LEE of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CANDLER].

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I have not a single criticism to offer in reference to the distinguished Senator from Alabama, the ex-governor, who offered this amendment on the floor of the Senate. I do not think it was necessary even for my distinguished friend from Alabama, Mr. OLIVER, and my other distinguished friend from Alabama, Mr. ALMON, to compliment and praise him and tell you what a good man he is, and how able a man he is, and how patriotic a man he is, and how desirous he is to accomplish the great good for the cotton growers of the South. We all admit that he is a good man, a sincere man, an honest man, a patriotic man, and there is no criticism of him. But my friend from Alabama, Mr. ALMON, closed his speech with the declaration that he did not know of anybody that was oposed to this Comer amendment except the gamblers on the Cotton Exchange of New York and the Cotton Exchange of New Orleans. I am neither a gambler on the Cotton Exchange of New York nor the Cotton Exchange of New Orleans nor the cotton exchange anywhere; never was and never expect to be. The author of the amendment says that he owns eight large cotton mills, and is therefore largely interested in the manufacture of cotton in this country. He states that in his own speech on the floor of the Senate—that he is a continuous operator on the exchange, buying as much as 25,000 bales of cotton in course of time on the cotton exchanges of New York and New Orleans. Therefore, it seems to me that somebody among the operators on the exchange is in favor of this proposition. [Laughter.] I doubt all the gamblers on the Cotton Exchange of New York and the Cotton Exchange of New Orleans being opposed to the Comer amendment. [Applause.]

Now, the strongest evidence why this amendment should be defeated at this time, and the amendment of the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. YOUNG] should be adopted, is illustrated on the floor to-day by the speeches made pro and con on this proposition. The great difficulty is that there is nobody that understands what it means. There is no one that can tell you definitely what the effect will be, and therefore the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] was correct when he warned you against voting for something that you did not understand, that you did not know anything about. The cotton proposition not only affects the people of the South but is a national question and affects vitally the prosperity and welfare of every section of the United States. Not only that, but it goes even beyond the seas and brings back yellow gold from over there to help fill the channels of trade in this country. Therefore, it is of vital importance not only to us of the Southland but also to you gentlemen who live in other sections of the country. [Applause.]

Is there anybody who knows what it means? No. And nobody knows any more about the amendment offered by the distinguished gentleman from South Carolina, and yet we are asked to vote for it. We do not know what it means. We have not had an opportunity to read it; it is not printed in the RECORD; it is offered on the floor of the House on the spur of the moment. This amendment was offered on the floor of the Senate on the spur of the moment. Nobody knows what either one means. [Applause.]

Here is an extract from a letter written to the distinguished Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] from the president of the cotton exchange in New Orleans, in which he says:

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 29, 1920.

HON. JOSEPH E. RANSDELL,
United States Senator from Louisiana, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: After carefully reading and considering Senator COMER'S amendment to bill H. R. 12272, I have come to the conclusion, although I have not had legal advice, that the ambiguity of the language of the said amendment is such as to cause considerable confusion and litigation and the probable closing of the cotton exchanges until a final decision would be rendered by the Supreme Court of the United States if it should be adopted.

Here is a statement from the Department of Agriculture when the Senator called them up for their opinion:

To confirm my own opinion in this matter, I called up the Bureau of Markets this morning, read this letter to them, and asked what construction they placed upon it? They replied that they had no right whatsoever as an administrative bureau to be giving any advice on legislation, but if I asked them how they construed the Comer amendment as it now appears in the bill pending before the conferees, they would say that it is ambiguous; that they do not understand quite what it means; and that if Congress is to pass this amendment they would respectfully suggest that it be corrected so as to make its meaning clear.

The cotton exchange does not know what it means, the Department of Agriculture does not know what it means. Now, let me read you what the very able Senator from South Carolina says.

The distinguished Senator from South Carolina, Senator SMITH, when he was asked upon the floor of the Senate—and you will find it in the RECORD—what this amendment meant, and what its effect would be, replied:

As to just what effect the amendment may have on the general price of cotton is problematical, just as it was problematical when I had it restricted to 10 grades. I expected more benefit in a way, but I had not properly discounted the effect of the Government order. However, it remains to be seen; I do not know just what use those who deal in it will put it to.

That is the statement of one of the greatest experts in the United States on cotton, a man who has made cotton his life study. [Laughter.]

Not only that, but I am going to show you that the author of the amendment himself when asked a specific and direct question on the floor of the Senate as to what this amendment meant, as to what its effect would be, said:

Mr. COMER. I can answer immediately, the very minute that this goes into effect as a law, that then the contract market would base on the middling market or very near to it. At present it is basis middling, which can, as I just showed you, be 4 or 5 cents a pound under the spot market. This will make it basis spot market and basis middling. You will have practically one basis. That is, I think it will operate that way.

He does not say that he knows it will operate that way; he just thinks it will. When you come to dealing with a great product like this, that involves so vitally the interests and welfare of the people not only of one great section of our country but of all the people throughout the United States, I do not think you ought to be willing to take a man's "think" about it—we ought to know what the effect of it will be. [Applause.]

When we passed the original cotton-futures act we had hearings before the Agricultural Committee for weeks in the consideration of it. When we concluded the hearings, after mature and careful consideration we framed the act and presented it to the House, limiting the tenderable cotton as we believed best at that time, and it was passed by the Congress. When we deemed it necessary and wise to contract the grades and bring them absolutely and beyond a shadow of doubt within the grades that were spinnable we passed the amendment of 1919, the effect of which is to bring the grades within those limits, and nothing but merchantable, spinnable cotton can now be tendered on contract. Let me appeal to you, have a hearing and know what this thing means, because I have shown you that no one who has talked about it knows what it means. Let us send it to a committee, have full hearings, and find out what it does mean before we enact it into permanent law. [Applause.]

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS].

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, in order that what I said a few moments ago may have weight, I want to read from a distinguished authority upon this subject with reference to myself. The speech I am about to read from was made by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS] on the 16th of December, 1908, and I now read from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD what he said at that time about my humble self:

How much cotton passes through this cotton exchange? I have no figures before me for the year just ended, but I find in a speech delivered on this floor last spring by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] the figures for some previous years, which will answer my purpose just as well. I quote the figures furnished by the gentleman from Tennessee with very much confidence, Mr. Chairman. I always follow his lead with satisfaction and with assurance, because I know he is always informed, always accurate, always honest, and therefore always right.

[Laughter and applause.]

Phantom cotton, spook cotton, cotton that never was and never will be. An inexhaustible supply against an inexhaustible demand—as long as Mr. Sully can stand on his feet and say "I buy" and Mr. Brown can muster the strength to say "I sell." One million, ten million, fifty million bales! In the meantime the planter who has cotton for sale and the manufacturer who desires to purchase it must stand by in confusion until one of these worthies is "forced to the wall." The amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee simply says to these "investors," "You shall not use the mails of the United States to carry on any such business," and I believe that ought to be the law.

[Applause.]

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. I have no time left to yield.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, what I do not know about cotton grading would fill very many large volumes, but I do have an opinion with regard to legislation. My opinion is that we are seldom justified in legislating on an appropriation bill. We are never justified in legislating on an appropriation bill unless our legislation is of a character that is practically universally accepted and we are simply using an appropriation bill as a medium for carrying out the practically unanimous will of the House. Where there is any serious division of opinion, legislation should not be written into law on an appropriation bill except in cases of special urgency or emergency. Therefore I hope that the proposition of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON] will be voted down and that the motion of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. YOUNG] will be agreed to. [Applause.]

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUIN]. [Applause.]

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Speaker, I come from a State and a district that produces cotton. After having listened to these speeches, I suggest to you gentlemen from the North, who know nothing about the production of cotton, to beware of these Greeks bearing gifts. Not a single man who digs in the soil and produces cotton is in favor of this Comer amendment. The author of this amendment over at the other end of the Capitol is a big cotton manufacturer, and he makes use of cotton from the highest to the lowest grades. These gentlemen who favor this amendment are all surrounded by cotton factories, all over their districts, and of course they smell the Comer amendment. The gentlemen here from the South who represent the farmers, who represent the cotton farmers who actually dig in the soil and produce this cotton, know that this proposed amendment is against the man who toils. The gentleman from South Carolina says we are here to look out for the manufacturer and the farmer. I say we are here to look out for the interests of all of the people, and unless the farmer who produces this cotton is protected and safeguarded in this legislation, we will be bound to lessen the production of cotton. The farmer to-day who is producing cotton is getting a fairly good price for it. I am for the farmer, and I want him to get a better price for his cotton and all other crops he may raise. Why is it that these gentlemen who pretend to be friends of the farmer are wanting to put an unknown equation into it so as to hogtie him and make it impossible for him to receive a reasonable price? Do you not know that this amendment means that if the farmer brings 100 bales of cotton to town to sell it only one-third under this amendment in our section can possibly come up to these grades? The other two-thirds will not have any price. They will offer him a proper price for the one-third and the other two-thirds that come below the middling cotton will be left there to be sacrificed, so that these men who are operating the cotton mills can get it for much less than it is really worth. That is what is the matter, and that is what this amendment proposes to do. Do not let them fool you. I want you gentlemen to kill this amendment. You men who are disinterested financially or in any other way in the cotton business can see that these Greeks bearing these gifts are endeavoring to drag in a Trojan horse, and they are trying to run it over this Congress. There have been no hearings, there is no evidence, no witness has been produced. This is nothing but a stalking horse offered to this Congress to fool you and to hamstring the hard-working farmer who makes the cotton. [Applause.]

Let us kill it by adopting the Young amendment, and let the law stand as it is written, which is doing well for the farmer. [Applause.]

Mr. McCLINTIC. Mr. Speaker, the cotton market is more susceptible to outside influences than any market we have dealing with the products of the farm. I do not believe that there is any man from the South who can have any conception of what the effect of this amendment will be on the market. It is very dangerous to try to write a law to govern the grading or the price of cotton without allowing the committee having jurisdiction to carefully consider the same. The farmers are satisfied, the cotton buyers are satisfied, the people of the South are not raising any complaint with the present price being paid them for cotton, and it does seem to me that it would be the height of foolishness for this body to consider an amendment without having a hearing and giving all interested an opportunity of coming here and presenting any testimony they would care to present either for or against the amendment. My friends, the fly in the ointment is the fact that the spinners are not satisfied with the kind of cotton that is delivered when they buy or sell a future contract. They do not have to depend on the stock markets to secure a supply of cotton. They can go out and buy this cotton from the people who have cotton to sell and then they will not have cause for complaint. Why, if this amendment is adopted into law and we make the future markets of the country the place to get deliveries of spot cotton, we are liable to cause what has been done in the past—have express trains carrying cotton back and forth from New Orleans to New York in order to settle contracts, thereby raising the cost of cotton to such an extent that every article that is manufactured out of cotton will be higher in price, which will increase the burden that is being paid by the taxpayers all throughout the United States. And so I say to you I hope an amendment of this kind, one that no one here knows anything about as to what effect it will have on the cotton situation, will not be considered by this body until the committee having jurisdiction has time to examine every phase of it. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, in reaching a conclusion on the Comer amendment, I have been guided by only one purpose, to determine whether it would benefit or be detrimental to the interests of the producing farmer. The time has come when our producers must have fair play and when our farmers must not have their interests sacrificed.

My colleague from Texas [Mr. YOUNG] is an able member of the Committee on Agriculture. He has given the subject of cotton farming and what is best for the cotton producer long, intensive study. He is a man of good, sound judgment. He has the best interests of the cotton farmer earnestly at heart. He is soon to leave this Congress to resume cotton growing on his farm in Texas. He is against this Comer amendment and believes that it should not pass.

Shortly after this Comer amendment was placed as a rider on the Agricultural appropriation bill, with no hearings and very little consideration by the Senate, our Texas delegation took the question under consideration and reached the unanimous conclusion that it was not for the best interests of the cotton growers.

I have great respect for the president of the Farmers' Union of Texas, and under most circumstances would give great weight to his opinion, but in this instance I am forced to believe that he does not fully understand the provisions of this amendment, or in what ways it may affect the cotton producer's interests.

The following article appearing in the Wall Street Journal for May 7, 1920, seems to throw some light on the question, hence I desire to insert it here:

REVIEW AND OUTLOOK—A SENATOR AND HIS RIDER.

On April 1 the rider to an appropriation bill, introduced by Senator COMER in the United States Senate, was criticized adversely in these columns. It is to this effect:

"Hereafter each lot of cotton classified as tenderable in whole or in part on a section 5 contract of said act, shall give to the buyer the right to demand that one-half of the contract shall be delivered in the official cotton standard grades of the United States of middling fair, strict good middling, good middling, strict middling, and middling, and that the seller shall have the option of delivering the other half of said contract from any of the official cotton standard grades as established in said act."

Apart from the standing objection to effecting important changes in business practice through riders to appropriations, thus preventing a presidential veto, this was criticized because the planter would be the chief sufferer by the outlawry of 40 per cent of his cotton. To do justice between the producer and the spinner the New York Cotton Exchange fixes an average grade for price adjustments. This is called "middling," and a premium is fixed on the grades above, with a discount for those below. This method is obviously fair and insures a market for the whole crop. Senator COMER writes to this newspaper:

"The Wall Street Journal:

"My attention has just been called to your issue of April 1 and argument in same headed 'Kill this rider.'

"This article differs so much from the facts in the case that I am sending you my several discussions before the Senate of the proposed amendment, and also copy of my letter to-day to Hon. Charles Lever, which I think covers all the possible objections to the proposed amendment, and if you will excuse me for the statement, it all comes in the largest measure, just as yours has, from misinformation as to the amendment and the intent of same.

"There is no question but what it would stabilize values, making the contract of the exchanges approximate the price of spot cotton. Exchanges are not the medium of value; there is no inherent quality to make value in anything; I mean, true value. What we are trying to do is to take from them the power to represent an untrue value, and which, if accomplished, will make the exchanges function truly in business, which function is to represent the index values, and if carried out will very greatly improve their usefulness in business. You can use any part of this you want.

"You might wire me your charge for printing the speech before the Senate as of April 17.

"B. B. COMER."

Senator COMER'S last clause, whether intended as an insinuation or as an inducement, may be passed over, and passed on for what it is worth.

All his letter to Congressman Lever shows is that in March there was a possible arbitrage profit in the differences between quotations in cotton between New Orleans and New York. Nobody denies it. Accident creates such differences between the New York Stock Exchange and London, and between jobbing houses in any two cities of this country. There is no mystery about the rise in the March option in New York on March 23 on contracts to be settled or recalled near the end of that month. There was not much cotton in New York; strikes and other transportation troubles made it impossible to get cotton here, while New Orleans was unaffected.

Mr. COMER'S measure would largely benefit spinners at the expense of the grower. Who's Who in America says Senator COMER, of Alabama, "is also interested in milling and cotton manufacturing." So is the Wall Street Journal, but not in the same way.

If Mr. COMER chooses to call the extinction of a broad and active market, with the substitution of one restricted to grades ranging from middling to above that quality, "stabilization," he is welcome to the definition. You could certainly stabilize a mule by hamstringing it. Senator COMER'S rider is vicious. It could not be passed as a separate measure, and in any form would be certain to produce results exactly opposite to those he claims.

The planter gets a square deal now, but under the operation of this regulation, with the lower grades of cotton untenderable on contract, would be at the mercy of the market on all those grades.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing the paper for which I asked unanimous consent a few moments ago and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER]——

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not recognize the gentleman for that purpose.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK]. [Applause.]

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, within the length of time at my disposal I could not expect to discuss this amendment at length, but I have listened with a good deal of interest to the very able arguments of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON] and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER], and these arguments are all based upon the erroneous assumption that the cotton exchange is a spot exchange. If in fact and in practice a cotton exchange was a spot exchange, their arguments would be good, but it never has been used for that purpose and I dare say it never will be so used. There are many reasons, I think, why it could not be. I think by giving a practical illustration of the situation I can illustrate the function of a cotton exchange better than any other way. I live in a section of Texas which produces some of the best long staple cotton in the cotton belt. Now, when a mill in Fall River or New Bedford, Mass., wants to buy Red River, Tex., cotton they do not go on the cotton exchange and buy a contract, expecting to get that kind of cotton. The way it is done is this: A dealer in cotton like W. R. Moore & Co., of my city, goes to Fall River or New Bedford, Mass., as the case may be, and makes a contract to sell a thousand bales of a particular grade and staple of cotton and comes back home; and, in order to protect himself against any possible advance of the market, he goes and buys on the cotton exchange a thousand bales of cotton, and thereby insures his business against the hazard of an advance in the market, and without that insurance he would probably not care to take the risk of making the spot contract. In a similar way, the mill which buys the cotton can insure itself against a decline in the market by selling 1,000 bales on the cotton exchange. In other words, the exchange dealings are used as a price insurance, and the whole cotton trade is built upon that basis, and I would fear to adopt an amendment which would restrict the contract in the manner of the Comer amendment.

The present law seems to be working to the satisfaction of most all who produce or deal in cotton, and I think no change so wide in its scope as this Comer amendment should be adopted without a full hearing and a clear showing that it would benefit the producers of cotton and the cotton trade in general. Therefore I shall vote for the motion of my colleague [Mr. YOUNG]. [Applause.]

Mr. HAUGEN. I yield two minutes and a half to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY].

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I do not know that I understand this amendment, but if it means what it is intended to mean I think its effect would be in one respect what I do not like. The cotton, as we understand it now, is graded into 10 grades under the law, and there is not any question that in the practical, actual market the difference in the price between the low grades and higher grades is already greater than the real difference in the actual value. That is the result of speculation. The effect of this amendment, if it should mean what it was intended to mean, in my judgment, would be to artificially bear the price of the low grades and bull the price of the high grades. Eighty per cent of the cotton in the country is low grade, and I know that the effect of the Comer amendment in speculative market, at least on 80 per cent of the cotton of our country, would be artificial bearing of price, and for that reason I think any man interested in the growing of cotton ought to be opposed to the Comer amendment. I have stated it as nearly as I can. I do not think it is any proper function of legislation to bull one commodity by bearing another. I have not time to explain just how I think this would be the effect of this amendment, but I do think so—and therefore shall vote "aye" on the motion of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. YOUNG] to strike out the Comer Senate amendment.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER].

Mr OLIVER. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Mississippi, whose ad hominem arguments usually excite interest and pleasurable amusement, claimed that no one really interested in the cotton grower had given his indorsement to this measure. If the gentleman had taken the time to read the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, he would have found that the president of the Cotton Growers' Association, Mr. Wanamaker, and Mr. Barrett, whom he doubtless knows and who has been for many years greatly interested in cotton, also the commissioner of agriculture of the State of Georgia, who is a farmer, who has given much thoughtful study to the subject, and many others strongly indorse this amendment. And it happens that a distinguished citizen of Texas, a Mr. Lyday, who, I understand, is president of the Farmers' Union, wires as follows:

B. B. COMER, Washington:

My first impression was your amendment would reduce value low grades. Careful investigation has convinced me I was wrong, since your amendment would unquestionably make contracts for middling more valuable.

All grades would be carried up with it, as price of all grades are based on middling; privilege of tendering low grades on contracts militates against values of all contracts and enables speculators to manipulate markets.

Cotton has but one real value. That is for spinning. Tendering unspinnable cotton hampers contracts for actual delivery, converts trading into an uncertain gamble, and injuriously affects all legitimate interests.

D. E. LYDAY.

Mr. UPSHAW. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER. Yes.

Mr. UPSHAW. Is it not passing strange that all these leaders who have given a lifetime to activity as friends of the cotton growers should rest under the indictment of not knowing what they want? Is it not passing strange that all these men, except one, have asked us to support this, and they are all of approved leadership?

Mr. OLIVER. These men are all acknowledged and well-known friends of the cotton producers. They have given careful study to this amendment, and the reasons for its adoption are sound and urgent in their opinion.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired. All time has expired. The question is on agreeing to the substitute offered by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON].

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. STEVENSON and Mr. MANN of Illinois asked for a division.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina asks for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 14, noes 138.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama makes the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Speaker, I will withdraw that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama withdraws the point of no quorum.

So the amendment was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. YOUNG].

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, may we not have that reported?

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. YOUNG of Texas moves to strike out all of lines 11 to 20, inclusive, in the Senate amendment.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I think that ought to be put in the proper form.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will again report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. YOUNG of Texas moves to recede and concur in the Senate amendment, on page 92, to strike out all of lines 11 to 20, inclusive.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. It really ought to be in form to strike out all after the first five lines.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Texas desire to modify his amendment?

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. In the print that I had my amendment was a correct amendment. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has a different print.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I have the official print.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. From the official print I change my amendment on page 92, Senate amendment No. 249.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Concur in the Senate amendment with an amendment striking out all after the first five lines of the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the modified amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. YOUNG of Texas moves to recede and concur with an amendment striking out of the Senate amendment all after the first five lines.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Texas.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I believe that that disposes of all amendments. I ask for a further conference on the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks for a further conference. Without objection it will be so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, before the announcement of the conferees I make a preferential motion to instruct the conferees to recede and concur in Senate amendment No. 93.

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the conferees have already been instructed to further insist upon the provision of the House.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. A motion to instruct the conferees is in order, but the motion offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] is not in order, because the conferees do not have it within their power to recede and concur.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I move to instruct the conferees to concur in Senate amendment No. 93.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas offers a motion, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BLANTON moves to instruct the conferees to concur in Senate amendment No. 93.

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Speaker, I make a point of order against the motion of the gentleman from Texas on the ground that the conferees have already been instructed by the House to further insist upon the provision in the bill as passed by the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman on that point. It seems to the Chair that certainly the conferees have not yet been instructed. Of course, an instruction of this kind runs exactly counter to the action that the House has taken in insisting on its disagreement, but the Chair, unless authority is presented to him, does not see why it is out of order to move to instruct the conferees.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Of course, it is in order to move to instruct the conferees.

Mr. BLANTON. Of course it is.

Mr. KING. Would not the proper procedure be for the gentleman to move to reconsider?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think so.

Mr. BLANTON. This is the first motion that has been made to instruct.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of the House, of course, is to instruct the House conferees to insist on the action that the House has taken; but the House has taken an action that is contrary to the motion. Before you do that you have got to reconsider that action. The House has already expressed itself and insisted upon a certain position. Now, a motion to instruct the conferees to insist upon that position would be in order, and that is the proper procedure, but the motion which the gentleman offers is contrary to the practice of the House, in that it instructs the conferees to disregard the action of the House, which action has not been reconsidered, and it would be a contradictory instruction.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, it quite frequently happens that the House disagrees to all Senate amendments, and then instructs the conferees to do a certain thing in conference. Of course, the conferees can not concur in a Senate amendment—the form in which the motion was made—but what was intended undoubtedly was to instruct the conferees in conference to agree to the Senate amendment. The action of the House, insisting on disagreement, does not militate at all against the power of the House to instruct the conferees. It can give such instructions as it pleases.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Certainly.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman refers to a situation where a House bill comes back with Senate amendments and we formally disagree to the Senate amendments and appoint conferees. Then it is the practice of the House to give such specific instructions as the House may care to give; but we have now passed that stage. The conferees have come back and asked for instructions, and the House has already instructed them. That is the object of the procedure which the House has gone through to-day, to test the sense of the House, and upon this proposition we have already instructed the conferees.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I think probably it would have been wiser, if you wanted a vote on the subject, to have had a vote on the motion to insist; but as far as the parliamentary situation is concerned it is in order to instruct the conferees after the conference is asked for and before the conferees are appointed, whatever the action of the House may have been in reference to the amendments. We are in the same position now that we are at any other time. We have simply disagreed to the Senate amendments, that is all.

Mr. WINGO. Would not the proper practice, in keeping with the precedents of the House, have been for the gentleman from Texas to have moved to concur when the House had up the differences between the House and Senate?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I am not going to undertake to determine that question.

Mr. WINGO. That would have been the proper practice.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Either motion could have been made, in my judgment. If it had been I, I would have made a motion to concur instead of this.

Mr. WINGO. I venture the assertion that never before has such a situation arisen. The proper practice would have been to move to concur. The House has voted a specific instruction, and that is to insist on the disagreement. Now, the House having expressed itself, this would be an indirect way of reconsidering that, without a formal reconsideration, and it certainly would be confusing, because any gentleman could take up the time of the House in the future, after the House had spent perhaps a whole day upon a proposition, and then, just before the conferees were appointed, get up and move an instruction that was contrary to the action which the House had taken, and that would be contrary to the spirit of the rule. This case is analogous to one where a motion is pending and another motion should be made to negative the pending affirmative proposal. To adopt the motion of the gentleman from Texas would be to instruct the conferees to disregard the instruction just given, a contradictory proposition never contemplated by the rule. If this motion is in order, an amendment to it is in order to instruct on all the other amendments the House has just passed on, and then a Member could demand a division of the questions and force a separate vote on each, and the House would go over again its entire action, which would be absurd.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MONDELL. On amendment 116 the House voted down a motion to recede and concur. Would it now be in order to instruct the conferees to recede and concur in that amendment?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not care to express an opinion on an academic question.

Mr. MONDELL. I ask that question because on the answer to it depends whether or not the motion just made is in order; because if it is in order now to entertain a motion contrary to the action of the House this afternoon in one regard, it is in order to entertain a motion to instruct the conferees contrary to the action of the House on another amendment. I submit, Mr. Speaker, we never would get through with the proceedings when a bill was in conference if we took one action on an amendment and then followed it by taking action directly opposite.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I am moving to instruct the conferees after the conference has been asked and agreed upon and before the conferees have been appointed. There has been no instruction to the conferees. This is the first motion of that kind that has been made. As to what would have been another method of procedure is a different question. The Chair will remember that the question was put on amendment 93 when the House was in disorder, and not even the Chairman himself knew that a vote was being taken on that particular amendment. I rose and called attention to the Chair that time should be given to the discussion of the amendment. Nothing was left but to proceed under the rules of the House and ask for an instruction at the proper time, and I insist that the motion is in order.

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Speaker, the time to instruct the conferees is before they are appointed with reference to matters with which the House had not up to that time taken any action. Certainly when the House has taken action, final action, and disposed of it, then when a motion is made diametrically opposite to the action of the House previous to that time, it is not in order because it would involve great confusion. The House has specifically on this direct proposition disagreed to the amendment and instructed the conferees to further insist on the House provision. Having done that, it is a closed incident, and unless the House reconsiders its action the motion of the gentleman is not in order.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The House never reaches this stage until it has disposed of the Senate amendments. Either the House has concurred in certain Senate amendments or disagreed to the Senate amendments.

Mr. CANDLER. In this case it has disagreed, and the conferees have been instructed to further insist on the House provision.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. They have disagreed or concurred. If they have concurred, there is nothing more for them to do. If they disagree, they ask for a conference. You can not ask for a conference until you have a disagreement.

Mr. CANDLER. The House has voted to further insist.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. You never could have any instruction at all, according to the gentleman's contention, because you never ask for a conference until you have disagreed to the amendment. That is the action of the House. Now, the gentleman says you can not change the action of the House.

Mr. MONDELL. It would have been in order to make this motion at the proper time when the amendment was under consideration.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. That has nothing to do with the question. It is in order when the Senate amendment is under consideration to offer a motion to concur in the Senate amendment or to concur with an amendment to the Senate amendment, and frequently gentlemen in favor of the proposition permit the House to disagree and then offer a motion directing what the conferees shall do. According to the contention of the gentlemen you could not offer a motion to instruct the conferees ever. You can not offer a motion to instruct the conferees until you ask for a conference, and you can not ask for a conference until you have disagreed to the Senate amendment.

Mr. RUBEY. We have sent this bill to conference, and the conferees have been working on it and agreed upon every amendment except three. Now they come back to the House for instructions on these three amendments, and we have given them instructions on amendment 93.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The conferees represent the attitude of the House. We have disagreed to Senate amendments, but we have not instructed the conferees at all; we have the right now to instruct the conferees.

Mr. WINGO. I want to submit one observation to the Chair. If the Chair rules that the gentleman's motion is in order and the House votes to instruct the conferees, that will be an instruction to disregard the solemn judgment of the House heretofore expressed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed that there is no exact precedent on the point. The Chair thinks that the proper time to make a motion to instruct is after the conference has been asked for and before the conferees are appointed. The Chair recognizes that there is force in what the gentleman from Arkansas says, that this motion is contradictory to the judgment of the House heretofore expressed, but at the same time, inasmuch as parliamentary law does allow a motion to instruct, the Chair does not see why the mere fact that it is contradictory to what the House has done at a former time should prevent it. That is a forcible argument against making it. But if the parliamentary rule allows the motion, the fact that the House has already expressed itself against it would not of itself make it out of order. Of course, this question seldom arises, because the motion would generally be recognized as futile. The gentleman from Texas has fairly stated the facts in explanation of how it arises now—that there was confusion and that the issue was not fully understood in the House when the vote was taken. It is probable that only under similar circumstances would the question arise, although it might arise where a Member thought that the House had changed its mind after several hours had elapsed. At any rate, the parliamentary rule is that before the conferees are appointed a motion to instruct is in order, and there being no authority limiting that the Chair rules that the motion of the gentleman from Texas is in order.

Mr. RAKER. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RAKER. Would it be in order on Senate amendment 116 to instruct the conferees to recede and concur in that amendment?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not care to express himself on that parliamentary inquiry at this time. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Texas to instruct the conferees to concur in the Senate amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were—ayes 33, noes 101.

So the motion was rejected.

The Chair appointed the following conferees: Mr. HAUGEN, Mr. MCLAUGHLIN of Michigan, and Mr. LEE of Georgia.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL—VETO MESSAGE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read:

To the House of Representatives:

I am returning, without my signature, H. R. 12610, "An act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and for other purposes."

I object to and can not approve section 8 of the bill, which amends section 11 of the act approved March 1, 1919, as follows:

SEC. 8. That section 11 of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and for other purposes," is hereby amended by striking out the first proviso and inserting the following in lieu thereof:

"Provided, That hereafter no journal, magazine, periodical, or similar Government publication shall be printed, issued, or discontinued by any branch or officer of the Government service unless the same shall have been authorized under such regulations as shall be prescribed by the Joint Committee on Printing, and such publications shall not contain any commercial advertisements: Provided further, That the foregoing provisions of this section shall also apply to mimeographing, multigraphing, and other processes used for the duplication of typewritten and printed matter, other than official correspondence and office records."

That section provides that no journal, magazine, periodical, or similar Government publication shall be printed, issued, or discontinued by any branch or officer of the Government service unless authorized under regulations prescribed by the Congressional Joint Committee on Printing, and furthermore prohibits mimeographing, multigraphing, and other processes used for the duplication of typewritten and printed matter other than official correspondence and office records, unless authorized under such regulations of the Congressional Joint Committee on Printing. Aside from the control over the printing, issuing, or discontinuing of periodicals or similar Government publications by the Congressional Joint Committee on Printing, the obvious effect of this provision would be to give to that committee power to prevent the executive departments from mimeographing, multigraphing, or otherwise duplicating any material which they desire, and, in that way, power to determine what information shall be given to the people of the country by the executive departments. The committee apparently would have power, for example, to prevent even the making of carbon copies of anything other than official correspondence and office records. Without raising any constitutional question, I think that this section, which would give the Congressional Joint Committee on Printing power to exercise censorship over the executive departments, is an encroachment on the functions of the Executive and incompatible with good government. I am in entire sympathy with the efforts of the Congress and the departments to effect economies in printing and in the use of paper and supplies, but I do not believe that such a provision as this should become law. I should also call attention to the fact that by its terms the section in question absolutely forbids mimeographing, multigraphing, and other duplicating processes in the executive departments (except as permitted by regulations established by the Congressional Joint Committee on Printing) and thus imposes a flat prohibition against the exercise of executive functions.

If we are to have efficient and economical business administration of Government affairs, the Congress, I believe, should direct its efforts to the control of public moneys along broader lines, fixing the amounts to be expended and then holding the executive departments strictly responsible for their use. This can be accomplished by the enactment of legislation establishing an effective budget system, which I have heretofore urged. The Congress and the Executive should function within their respective spheres. Otherwise efficient and responsible management will be impossible and progress impeded by wasteful forces of disorganization and obstruction. The Congress has the power and the right to grant or deny an appropriation, or to enact or refuse to enact a law; but once an appropriation is made or a law is passed, the appropriation should be administered or the law executed by the executive branch of the Government. In no other way can the Government be efficiently managed and responsibility definitely fixed. The Congress has the right to confer upon its committees full authority for purposes of investigation and the accumulation of information for its guidance, but I do not concede the right, and certainly not the wisdom, of the Congress endowing a committee of either House or a joint committee of both Houses with power to prescribe "regulations" under which executive departments may operate. Under section 8 of the bill responsibility can not be definitely placed upon either the executive departments or the Joint Committee on Printing. It falls between them.

I regard the provision in question as an invasion of the province of the Executive and calculated to result in unwarranted interferences in the processes of good government, producing confusion, irritation, and distrust. The proposal assumes significance as an outstanding illustration of a growing tendency which I am sure is not fully realized by the Congress itself and certainly not by the people of the country. For that reason I am taking the liberty of pointing out a few examples of an increasing disposition, as expressed in existing laws and in pending legislative proposals, to restrict the executive departments in the exercise of purely administrative functions.

I do not care to discuss here the powers which previously have been conferred upon the Congressional Joint Committee on Printing, as they have passed into law, but I do feel that it is proper to point to a few specific examples of the administrative authority exercised by the committee under existing law in order to indicate the incongruity and inconsistency that already exist and which would be accentuated and aggravated if section 8 of the bill under consideration were enacted into law. In this connection, I invite the attention of the Congress to a letter from the chairman of the Joint Committee on Printing to the Public Printer, under date of March 19, 1920, replying to a request from the latter for a ruling by the committee as to the application to certain printing of section 89 of the printing act of 1895, restricting the printing of reports, publications, and documents to 1,000 copies each. In the communication mentioned, the Public Printer is "directed" to apply that section of the law in accordance with the "opinion" rendered by the chairman of the Joint Committee on Printing. To my mind, the opinion mentioned is nothing more or less than a direction to an executive officer in the performance of executive duties. The printing laws may give the Congressional Joint Committee on Printing authority to make interpretations of the law, but if they do, I think it is a most unwise procedure and that the statute should be revised.

Another example of the exercise of administrative authority by the Joint Committee on Printing is to be found in a resolution adopted by that committee on April 2, 1920, prohibiting any person connected with any department of the Government from furnishing any publication for free distribution to any private individual, corporation, or agency, in lots to exceed 50 copies "without first making application to the Joint Committee on Printing." The resolution reads as follows:

Resolved by the Joint Committee on Printing, under authority of section 11 of Public Act No. 314, Sixty-fifth Congress, That no person connected with any department of the Government shall furnish any publication for free distribution to any private individual, corporation, or agency in lots to exceed 50 copies, without first making application to the Joint Committee on Printing, giving the name of the person or agency desiring the same, the name of the publication, and the number of copies desired: Provided, That this regulation shall not apply to publications which are sold at a price to cover the cost of same: Provided further, That the clerk of the Joint Committee on Printing be instructed to furnish to each department of the Government and to the Public Printer a copy of this resolution, with a request that the receipt of same be duly acknowledged.

I also invite attention to the creation by law of what is known as the Public Buildings Commission, consisting of two Senators, two Representatives, the Superintendent of the Capitol Buildings and Grounds, the officer in charge of public buildings and grounds, and the Supervising Architect or Acting Supervising Architect of the Treasury.

That commission, by law, is given—absolute control of and the allotment of all space in the several public buildings owned, or buildings leased by the United States in the District of Columbia, with the exception of the Executive Mansion and office of the President, Capitol Building, the Senate and House Office Buildings, the Capitol power plant, the buildings under the jurisdiction of the Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, and the Congressional Library Building.

The commission possesses the absolute power to order the several executive departments and independent establishments out of any of the buildings which they occupy, and, as a matter of fact, has directed various branches of the public service to vacate or to occupy specified space. It is organized and operates as a congressional commission and appears in the Congressional Directory under the heading "Congressional commissions and joint committees." The Senators serving upon it are appointed by the President of the Senate, the Representatives serving upon it are appointed by the Speaker of the House, while the other officials composing the commission are specifically named in the law. Its work, nevertheless, so far as it involves the allotting of space for administrative services and of ordering executive departments to move units into or out of Government-owned or leased buildings is distinctly executive in character.

My attention has been drawn to a pending legislative proposal of a similar character which I mention in this connection simply as a further illustration. When the bill which I am returning was under consideration in the Senate, an amendment was agreed to by the Senate transferring the Bureau of Efficiency from the jurisdiction of the President to the jurisdiction of the Congress. That amendment was eliminated in conference, but has reappeared in slightly changed form as a Senate amendment to the pending bill designed to establish a national budget system.

It is proposed to give that bureau more sweeping power of investigation than is usually conferred upon the committees of the Congress itself. It would function not as a committee of the Congress but as a bureau of the Congress, if such is permissible, with an officer of the Congress at its head. I do not here discuss the proposal in detail further than to cite it as another illustration of the tendency to which I invite attention.

In considering bills containing the provisions mentioned above, I was willing to overlook the objectionable features for the time being with the thought that they were designed as exceptional and temporary measures to meet unusual conditions. To permit such expedients to serve as precedents or accepted rules for legislation would, in my judgment, be most unfortunate and destructive of proper principles for the orderly and efficient management of the Government's business. I feel very strongly that the authority carried in section 8 of the bill herewith returned should not be conferred upon a legislative committee and that the entire section should be stricken from the measure.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
May 13, 1920.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the veto message be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa moves that the veto message be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I think we ought to have a quroum present now.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I will state to the gentleman from Texas that I intend to use only about five minutes. I only desire to say that the provision to which the veto message applies was a Senate amendment. I rather think that some amendment of that kind will be necessary—at least some legislation. This bill is in charge of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD], who is not present to-day, and, therefore, I think because of his absence and the absence of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON], another conferee, the bill should be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

I desire to call the attention of the House to the fact that the present law that was approved by the President on March 1, 1919, is more sweeping in respect to the legislation about which the President now complains than the provisions contained in the Senate amendment which has brought forth the veto. The present law provides:

Provided, That hereafter no journal, magazine, periodical, or other similar publication, shall be printed and issued by any branch or officer of the Government service unless the same shall have been specifically authorized by Congress, but such publications as are now being printed without specific authority from Congress may, in the discretion of the Joint Committee on Printing, be continued until the close of the next regular session of Congress, when, if authority for their continuance is not then granted by Congress they shall not thereafter be printed.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield.

Mr. GOOD. In just a minute.

Mr. BLANTON. Right there on that point.

Mr. GOOD. In a minute. The amendment in the bill that has been vetoed provides an amendment to that provision by substituting the following:

Provided, That hereafter no journal, magazine, periodical, or similar Government publication, shall be printed, issued, or discontinued by any branch or officer of the Government service unless the same shall have been authorized under such regulations as shall be prescribed by the Joint Committee on Printing, and such publications shall not contain any commercial advertisements.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. In a minute.

Mr. CALDWELL. I think the gentleman ought to be fair enough to read the rest of the paragraph.

Mr. GOOD. Oh, I shall gladly read the rest of the paragraph:

Provided further, That the foregoing provisions of this section shall also apply to mimeographing, multigraphing, and other processes used for the duplication of typewritten and printed matter, other than official correspondence and office records.

The situation is this: There are about 152 Government journals, magazines, periodicals and other publications that are printed without authority of law. Under the provision of the act approved by the President March last they are printed only by the sufferance of the Joint Committee on Printing. If we strike out of the pending bill the provision to which the President objects, then these magazines and publications can not be printed at all at the close of this session of Congress.

That was permanent law. It provided that these publications should not be printed at all, except that during this session of Congress they might be printed when authorized by the Joint Committee on Printing. I make this statement only because it seems to me there must be some misunderstanding somewhere, and if that amendment to which the President objects is stricken out entirely, then these publications at the close of this session of Congress will be discontinued.

The evil of which the President complains is in the act which the President approved on March 1, 1919. To some extent relief is given by the act which the President vetoed.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Iowa, that the message and bill be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, Mr. DREWRY was granted leave of absence, indefinitely, on account of recuperation from illness.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. LARSEN. Mr. Speaker, this morning I addressed the House for five minutes, and I do not think I asked permission to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the agricultural bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

ANNOUNCEMENT.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Mr. Speaker, I am in receipt of a telegram from my colleague, Mr. LAZARO, who is detained in Louisiana on account of grave illness in his family, asking me to say that had he been present to-day when the Comer amendment came before the House for consideration that he would have voted against it. As a matter of fact, his exact request was that I pair him against the Comer amendment.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to make a very brief statement.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, last week I asked unanimous consent, which was granted, to dispense with the business of Calendar Wednesday, and at that time it was suggested that it would probably be possible to arrange for an additional day for Calendar Wednesday business immediately following the business of yesterday, but the business of the House was such as to make that impracticable, and I now ask unanimous consent that Calendar Wednesday business may be in order on Tuesday next, in order to carry out what was, I think, in a way a tentative agreement or understanding with regard to the matter.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that Calendar Wednesday business be in order on Tuesday next.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I think we had better wait until Tuesday comes and see. Calendar Wednesday would come on Wednesday next, anyhow.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. MONDELL. Some gentlemen were very anxious to know in regard to the matter, and some gentlemen thought it had been practically agreed upon. However, the matter had not been presented to the House.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If the gentleman will yield, if that authority is granted does that resurrect the right to make that motion about those baskets?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Oh, no.

Mr. MONDELL. No; Calendar Wednesday business goes on in the regular order, whatever is properly in order on Calendar Wednesday. I would not want to pass on the question whether the motion will be in order.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Baskets are probably in the waste-basket.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, certain Members have asked about the business of to-morrow. If certain gentlemen are here who are expected, the Army and Navy pay bill will be called up in the morning, otherwise a rule providing an extension of the bill authorizing the purchase of farm loan bonds by the Government.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I object until Tuesday comes and we see what the condition of the business before the House is.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. RAMSEY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 9944. An act authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to accept on behalf of the United States the donation by Sedgwick Post, No. 10, Grand Army of the Republic, of its memorial hall property in Bedford, Taylor County, Iowa, for Federal building purposes.

The Speaker announced his signature to enrolled bill of the following title:

S. 2448. An act for the relief of certain officers of the United States Army, and for other purposes.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, May 14, 1920, at 12 o'clock noon.

FRIDAY, May 14, 1920.

(Legislative day of Tuesday, May 11, 1920.)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock noon, on the expiration of the recess.

NAMING A PRESIDING OFFICER.

The Secretary (George A. Sanderson) read the following communication:

UNITED STATES SENATE,
PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE,
Washington, D. C., May 14, 1920.

To the SENATE:

Being temporarily absent from the Senate, I appoint Hon. SELDEN P. SPENCER, a Senator from the State of Missouri, to perform the duties of the Chair this legislative day.

ALBERT B. CUMMINS,
President pro tempore.

Mr. SPENCER thereupon took the chair as Presiding Officer for the legislative day.

CALLING THE ROLL.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Reading Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Glass	McKellar	Simmons

Gerry	McCumber	Sheppard	Williams

Mr. GRONNA. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is absent, due to illness. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. GERRY. The Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN], the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS], and the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] are absent on official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-four Senators have answered to their names. The Senate resumes the consideration of House joint resolution 327.

TERMINATION OF WAR WITH GERMANY.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 327) terminating the state of war declared to exist April 6, 1917, between the Imperial German Government and the United States, permitting on conditions the resumption of reciprocal trade with Germany, and for other purposes.

Mr. STERLING. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the further consideration of the conference report on the civil-service retirement bill.

Mr. LODGE. Before that request is put, I wish to state that I do not think, under the unanimous-consent agreement, we can take up any outside matter while there is anyone here who desires to speak upon the pending measure. I understand that one of the Senators desires to speak upon it.

Mr. STERLING. I understand that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] desires to speak on the pending measure, but I hoped that he would yield long enough that we might dispose of this conference report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that objection is made to the request of the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. LODGE. A motion to take up the conference report would set aside the business of the unanimous consent. Certainly, nothing can be done in the way of other business except by unanimous consent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understood that objection had been made to the request of the Senator from South Dakota, and therefore the request has failed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is no objection, the Secretary will read the resolution.

The resolution (S. Res. 362) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Interstate Commerce Commission is hereby directed to furnish at the earliest possible date information to the Senate showing the causes for the present freight congestion in the principal cities of the United States and what efforts have been taken or are being taken or should be taken to relieve the present congested condition and to promptly move the freight tendered to the railroads.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I offer this resolution because I know that a very serious freight congestion exists. My information is that it is chiefly at some 15 principal American cities. The Interstate Commerce Commission has the matter under consideration, and there are reasons why this resolution should be passed and that the information the Interstate Commerce Commission may have may be laid before the Senate. I therefore ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

TEXTILE ALLIANCE (INC.).

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, last week in discussing the dyestuffs bill I made some references to the Textile Alliance (Inc.). I am this morning in receipt of a letter from the secretary of that association taking exception to some of my assertions. I think it is but fair that the letter should be inserted in the RECORD, and therefore ask unanimous consent to have that letter inserted in the RECORD with a copy of an accompanying letter from the Department of State.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TEXTILE ALLIANCE (INC.),
New York, May 13, 1920.

The Hon. CHARLES S. THOMAS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We have to-day received a copy of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of May 8 which contains a report of your speech on that date in the matter of the dye bill. There are inaccuracies or errors in the speech which we feel that we must without delay call to your attention.

The Textile Alliance (Inc.) is not "the moving power behind the dye bill"; it is not "the inspiration of the dye bill"; it is not "charged with the duty of securing dyes that are absolutely indispensable to the textile industry of this country," and it was in no respect whatever responsible for the statement made by witnesses before the Senate or other committee that Germany during the war had accumulated 250,000 tons of dyestuffs.

As a matter of fact the Textile Alliance (Inc.) is acting purely as an administrative agency for and at the request of the War Trade Board Section of the Department of State, and its relations with this department are shown by the inclosed copies of letters from it dated September 29, 1919, and October 10, 1919. In this respect the agency selected might equally well have been the American Express Co. or other profit-making corporation.

It has had no part whatever in the effort to secure protection for the American dye industry other than to present a statement to the committee of the House of Representatives in refutation of erroneous statements made regarding its functions and actions. Its officers have even refrained from the free expression of their personal opinion.

It is also incorrect to say that not a pound of dye can be received in this country excepting through the Textile Alliance (Inc.). In proof of this statement we beg to refer you to the War Trade Board Section of the Department of State, which has issued licenses in amounts unknown to the Textile Alliance (Inc.) for the import of dyes through other sources, and in particular we call your attention to the following shipment recently published in the Journal of Commerce and Commercial Bulletin, of New York, April 28:

Inward manifests, Hamburg-American steamer Carib. Grasselli Chemical Co., 374 casks alizarin.

For your further information we beg to state that the Textile Alliance (Inc.) is a membership corporation, organized under the laws of New York State. The voting members are the designated representatives of the principal textile trade associations, excepting that one representative is designated by a committee of a trade in which there is no comprehensive organization. It is incapable of making or retaining a profit. All of its activities during the war on behalf of the United States Government have been performed at cost, and, with the exception of the general manager, secretary, and treasurer, no officer, director, or member of the committee receives a salary or other compensation.

In view of the injustice that you have done to this organization, we request that you will correct the erroneous statements in your speech.

Yours, very truly, TEXTILE ALLIANCE (INC.).
WILLIAM B. DENTON,
Secretary.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, September 29, 1919.

Mr. A. M. PATTERSON,
President Textile Alliance (Inc.), New York.

SIR: Negotiations are now being carried on in Paris by the representatives of the allied associated Governments for the purpose of securing the early delivery of German dyes at prices similar to those described in annex 6 of part 8 of the treaty of peace with Germany. For your convenience there is inclosed herewith a copy of War Trade Board Ruling 819, in which the provisions of annex 6 are set forth in full. The War Trade Board section of the Department of State has determined to permit the importation of vat dyes from Germany in quantities sufficient to supply the requirements of the consumers of the United States for six months' period, October 1, 1919, to April 1, 1920; and it may be desirable that manufacturers in the United States be enabled to avail themselves of the benefits of such plan as may result from the current negotiations in securing the above-mentioned quantities of vat dyes. To bring this about it would be necessary to designate a central agency to act as an intermediary between the consumers of dyes in the United States and the allied authorities from or through whom the dyes are to be secured. The Department of State would be prepared to designate the Textile Alliance (Inc.) as such agency to perform the following services under the terms and conditions hereinbelow set forth:

1. The War Trade Board section of the Department of State will issue allocation certificates to consumers in the United States, stating that said consumers are entitled to secure the importation from Germany of vat dyes specified in such certificates.

2. The War Trade Board section of the Department of State would advise consumers of such arrangements as may result from current negotiations and will also inform them that the Textile Alliance (Inc.) has been designated to act in the capacity described in this letter.

3. The Textile Alliance (Inc.) will accept from consumers holding the above-mentioned allocation certificates orders for vat dyes in amounts not exceeding amounts specified in such certificates.

4. The prices to be paid for the dyes so ordered will be the prices agreed upon in Paris and communicated to the Textile Alliance (Inc.) by its representative in Paris hereinafter mentioned in paragraph No. 5. The terms and method of payment for all dyes ordered through the Textile Alliance (Inc.) will be prescribed by the Textile Alliance (Inc.) to accord with such arrangements as may result from the pending negotiations, and they will be subject to the approval of the War Trade Board section and subject also to the conditions hereinbelow in paragraph No. 6 contained.

5. The Textile Alliance (Inc.) will send a representative to Paris. Said representative will receive by cablegram from the Textile Alliance (Inc.) complete information as to the dyes which have been ordered through the alliance as described above, and he will place these orders with or through the allied authorities and will attend to all the details connected with the acquisition of, and payment for, the dyes and their shipment to the Textile Alliance (Inc.) for distribution to the consumers who have ordered them. In all these matters the representative of the alliance will receive the cooperation and advice of Dr. Charles H. Herty, who is now in Paris as a representative of the War Trade Board section.

6. The Textile Alliance (Inc.) will be entitled to charge a commission for the services rendered by it, which commission shall be sufficient to defray all expenses incurred in carrying out the plan and performing the acts described in this letter; but it is to be understood that the alliance will not retain any profits arising out of this transaction and that any overplus remaining out of commissions collected, after the payment of all expenses, will be distributed pro rata among the consumers by whom such commissions shall have been paid.

The department desires to be advised at an early date whether the Textile Alliance (Inc.) would be willing to perform the services described in this letter, provided the situation would seem to make such an arrangement desirable.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM PHILLIPS,
Acting Secretary of State.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, October 10, 1919.

The TEXTILE ALLIANCE (INC.),
New York.

GENTLEMEN: Referring to the department's letter of September 29 setting forth the proposal that the Textile Alliance (Inc.) should be designated as the agency to effect the importation and distribution of German dyes proposed to be secured as a result of negotiations then being conducted in Paris, and referring also to your letter of October 2, in which you inform the department that the Textile Alliance (Inc.) was prepared to act in the capacity aforesaid (subject to an exception which has since been withdrawn), the plan outlined in the first-mentioned letter has been finally completed in all substantial respects; and accordingly the Textile Alliance (Inc.) is hereby designated as the agency to effect the importation and distribution of German dyes under the conditions set forth in the above-mentioned letter of September 29, 1919.

The supervision of the operations of the above-mentioned plan will be conducted for the department by the War Trade Board section, and you are requested to consult with the chief of said section with respect to all further arrangements necessary for the consummation of the purchase, importation, and distribution of dyes which will be secured under said plan.

I am, gentlemen, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM PHILLIPS,
Assistant Secretary.
(For the Secretary of State.)

INSCRIPTIONS ON ARLINGTON AMPHITHEATER.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I have two telegrams in reference to the names of Lee and Jackson being inscribed on the amphitheater at Arlington, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the telegrams were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

COLUMBIA, S. C., May 13, 1920.

Senator E. D. SMITH,
Washington, D. C.:

Urge you to use your influence to have names of Lee and Jackson carved on amphitheater at Arlington.

JULIUS H. WALKER,
State Commander American Legion, South Carolina.

ST. MATTHEWS, S. C., May 10, 1920.

Hon. E. D. SMITH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

On behalf of Calhoun County Post, American Legion, at full meeting to-day, we wish to enter strongest protest against elimination of names of Lee and Jackson from list of American heroes to be carved on marble columns, Memorial Amphitheater, in Arlington National Cemetery. Action contemplated is not only extremely unjust to sons and grandsons of men who followed Lee and Jackson and Grant and Sherman, and who gave their lives side by side in great World War, but it is most unfortunate just at this time, when a friendly spirit of broad patriotism is manifest throughout our country. We feel in our protest we voice not only the sentiment of every southern State, but all broad-minded men of Nation.

GEORGE W. WANAMAKER, JR.,
Commander Calhoun County (S. C.) Post, American Legion.

TERMINATION OF WAR WITH GERMANY.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 327) terminating the state of war declared to exist April 6, 1917, between the Imperial German Government and the United States, permitting on conditions the resumption of reciprocal trade with Germany, and for other purposes.

[Mr. REED addressed the Senate. See Appendix.]

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum being suggested, the Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-seven Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATIONS—VETO MESSAGE.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, yesterday the President saw fit to veto the legislative appropriation bill, and based his veto on his objection to section 8, relative to the printing, mimeographing, or multigraphing of Government periodicals. This section was proposed by me as chairman of the Joint Committee on Printing in accordance with the following recommendation which that committee made to Congress in its recent report on Government periodicals and field printing (S. Doc. 265, 66th Cong., p. 10):

> The committee further recommends that it be given general supervision over all Government publications so as to bring about much-needed coordination in Government printing, and that the committee be empowered to pass on the publication or discontinuance of all Government journals, magazines, and periodicals from time to time instead of having the same specifically provided for by law. It is believed this supervision should be vested in some body not connected with any particular department of the Government, and, from the work it has already done in this connection, the committee is of the opinion that the authority may as well be intrusted to it as to any other governmental agency.

The efforts of the Joint Committee on Printing the past year to effect substantial economies in the public printing and binding have been bitterly opposed by some Government officials and denounced by certain outside influences. These outside influences have reaped substantial personal profits from Government publications. Such abuses, which involved the direct appropriation of public property to private use, were exposed by the report which the Joint Committee on Printing submitted to Congress. Since that report was made public certain influences, both within and without the departments, have left no stone unturned to assail and undermine the work of the committee.

One of the influences to which I refer is Roger W. Babson, who, on his retirement from a $5,000 Government position in the Department of Labor, took over the Bulletin from the Committee on Public Information without any compensation whatever to the Government. This transaction was revealed to the public in the report of the committee.

Babson, in a letter to me under date of April 16, 1920, protested against the committee's report and expressed his bitter opposition to the section on which the President bases his veto, and declared that he intended to become the "protector of the departments in Washington against those who are attempting to gag or censor them." It is evident, therefore, that Babson has made use of the President or his advisers in carrying out his threat and "determination to end" the censorship which, without the least foundation, he has charged against the committee.

The President or his advisers have been most grievously misled in this veto. I am sure the President did not understand the situation when he vetoed the bill. Here is the real situation that exists:

The legislative bill passed by the Sixty-fifth Congress and approved by the President on March 1, 1919, contained a provision that thereafter no Government journal, magazine, periodical, or similar publication shall be printed unless "specifically authorized by Congress," but added that such publications as were then being printed might, in the discretion of the Joint Committee on Printing, be continued until the close of this session of Congress, when—and I quote from the law itself—"if authority for their continuance is not then granted by Congress, they shall not thereafter be printed."

Under this authority from Congress, which was approved by the President, the Joint Committee on Printing undertook a careful investigation of all Government periodicals, the result of which is set forth in its report submitted on April 12, 1920. This report showed that 266 journals, magazines, and periodicals were being published by various branches of the Government at a cost of approximately $2,500,000 per annum.

As a result, either of the regulations adopted by the committee or the voluntary acts of the departments themselves, 111 of these publications, costing approximately $1,200,000 per annum, have been discontinued. This leaves 155 publications, the continuance of which was authorized by the committee until the end of this session of Congress, which is the extent of the authority that the committee has under the present law.

Nearly all of these 155 publications, which include many of the most important issued by the Government, particularly those relating to agriculture, commerce, and labor, will automatically go out of existence at the end of this session of Congress unless they shall have been specifically authorized by Congress in the meantime. In view of the large number of these publications and in order to make sure of their continued publication, the committee proposed section 8 to the legislative bill vetoed by the President. The chief purpose of this section was to give the Joint Committee on Printing power to permanently authorize these publications. It appeared entirely impractical for Congress itself to go into the merits of each one of the 155 or more periodicals, and the committee, therefore, felt that its proposal was in the interest of the publications themselves and not for the purpose of censorizing or suppressing them.

The fact is that if the President is really seeking to relieve the departments from any restrictions on their printing by Congress he ought to examine the provision that is annually contained in the sundry civil appropriation act. That provision is far more drastic than that proposed in either section 11, which he approved on March 1, 1919, or in section 8 of the bill just vetoed by him.

The provision I refer to is to be found on page 173 of the sundry civil bill, H. R. 13870, which has just passed the House. Similar provisions have been contained in the sundry civil acts for many years. It provides that no money appropriated for printing or binding for any executive departments shall be expended for any printing "except such as shall be certified in writing to the Public Printer by the respective heads or chiefs thereof to be necessary to conduct the ordinary and routine business required by law of such executive departments or establishments of the Government."

The provision also states that "all other printing required or deemed necessary or desirable by heads of executive departments or other establishments or offices or bureaus thereof shall be done only as Congress shall from time to time authorize." By this provision none of the periodicals which have been continued under section 11 could have otherwise been published at all if the law had been complied with by the departments.

I observe that the President says he is in entire sympathy with the efforts of Congress and the departments to effect economies in printing and in the use of paper and supplies, but that he does not believe such a provision as this should become law. I am very glad, indeed, that the President is in sympathy with the efforts to effect economies in printing, and I only wish that his sympathies in this regard might find some substantial evidence on his part or some act of some of his chief executive officers showing their belief in economy.

Everyone, with the possible exception of some Government officials who seem to have deliberately blinded themselves, knows the critical situation the country is in as regards its supply of paper. This shortage of paper has seriously affected the Government. We do not know from day to day whether we will have enough paper at the Government Printing Office to publish the next day's CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, or even a sufficient supply to print presidential vetoes.

Under date of February 16, 1920, this situation was again called to the attention of the departments by the committee. They were then advised that the Government Printing Office may soon be without sufficient paper to print even such publications as may be really necessary to the Government business. All the heads of the departments and other establishments of the Government were requested to at once advise the committee as to what publications might be suspended, at least temporarily, in order to conserve the rapidly diminishing supply of paper for such printing as was absolutely essential.

To this request the committee received substantially no responses from the departments that were of any practical value whatever. Some of the departments seemed insistent upon continuing their mad orgy of printing in utter disregard of the fact that the paper supply of the Government may soon come to an end. As a matter of fact, some of the heads of the departments even had the boldness to propose increased expenditures for printing rather than to submit to any economies at this time.

For example, the Secretary of Agriculture, who had just come into office, proposed to the committee that the covers of Farmers' Bulletins be printed in variegated colors like Joseph's coat at an increased cost of three or four times the present price of printing such covers in black and white. I hold a sample in my hand [exhibiting].

The Secretary of Agriculture further proposed that the distribution of Farmers' Bulletins be placed entirely in the hands of his department instead of four-fifths of them being allotted to Members of Congress. I call to your attention the fact that the Department of Agriculture during the past two years turned over nearly 1,000,000 copies of its publications to one private individual, who thus assumed for his advantage the distribution of publications for which employees of the Department of Agriculture are paid. If Congress should also turn over to the Department of Agriculture the distribution of bulletins which are now allotted to its Members, what assurance have we that that department will not in turn deliver these publications in bulk to some private individual who may thereby profit from the work which Members of Congress are now glad to undertake freely for their constituents?

The President cites as an example of the administrative authority by the Joint Committee on Printing to which he objects the resolution which it adopted on April 2, 1920, directing that the free distribution of Government publications to any private individual, corporation, or agency be restricted to lots of not exceeding 50 copies, without application to the Joint Committee on Printing. This resolution was adopted for the very purpose of checking the abuse to which I have just referred. The committee found that from January 5, 1898, to February 19, 1920, three Government departments alone had furnished 1,319,495 Government publications to a single private individual.

I do not believe that anyone who has the real interest of the Government and the public at heart can object to such a regulation checking a flagrant misuse of Government publications.

The President also calls attention to a letter which I, as chairman of the Joint Committee on Printing, addressed to the Public Printer under date of March 19, 1920, replying to a request from the Public Printer for a ruling by the committee as to the application that should be made of section 89 of the printing act of 1895 which restricts the printing of reports, publications, and documents to 1,000 copies each unless otherwise authorized by Congress.

The committee had ascertained, upon investigation, that this section of law restricting printing had been almost utterly ignored by the departments for many years. As a result of this deliberate violation of the law, the departments have been continually appealing to Congress for deficiency appropriations to provide for their printing excesses.

The report of the Joint Committee on Printing shows that in three years departmental officials had more than 30,000,000 copies of their speeches printed at the Government Printing Office at a cost of $109,066.35. These speeches and the envelopes used in mailing them required a total of approximately 1,500,000 pounds of paper. Including the cost of printing, envelopes, and the transportation in the mails, the speeches of these officials cost the Government $442,798.73. All of this was charged to the Public Treasury.

In contrast to this procedure by speech-making officials of the departments, it is but fair to point out that Members of Congress are required by law to pay out of their own funds the actual cost of printing all speeches distributed by them.

Another abuse which prompted the committee to call the Public Printer's attention to the gross violation of the 1,000-copy law was a so-called Health Almanac, of which the Public Health Service printed 100,000 copies at a cost of $2,929.46. I observe in its calendar for May that a notable event to be commemorated on May 30 is the fact that Surg. Gen. Rupert Blue was born on that day. To most of us this day is sacred as Memorial Day, but the Health Service calendar designates it as "Decoration Day," a term which is objected to by the true friends and relatives of those who sacrificed their lives on the field of battle.

A similar calendar was also printed in large numbers by the Bureau of Mines. In the Bureau of Mines calendar the "historical event" proposed to be commemorated on August 27 is the fact that Van. H. Manning was made Director of Mines on that date. The "historic event" as noted for December 15 is the fact that Mr. Manning was born on that date. I nearly overlooked the fact that the "historical event" printed for January 27 is that Samuel Gompers was born on that date. All of these, of course, are events of great historical significance, and I presume that in due time we will have bills proposed declaring them public holidays.

The last proviso of section 8, to which the President objects, is that making the law regulating Government periodicals apply also to mimeographing, multigraphing, and other processes used for the duplication of typewritten and printed matter, other than official correspondence or office records. The President says that under this provision the committee apparently will have power, for example, to prevent even the making of carbon copies of anything other than official correspondence and office records. I believe if the President had taken time to read section 11 of the act which he approved on March 1, 1919, in connection with section 8 of the legislative bill, he would never have made any such statement.

The sole purpose of the committee in proposing this provision was to meet a situation that has recently developed in the departments from the installation of large numbers of mimeographing and multigraphing machines. To evade the restrictions placed upon printing, some of the departments have undertaken to mimeograph or multigraph publications that in all common sense and due regard for economy ought to be printed. A preliminary investigation of such work by the departments in Washington shows that there are now nearly 100 duplicating and mailing units in the departments themselves outside of the Government Printing Office. These units contain nearly 500 duplicating machines, such as mimeographing and multigraphing, 265 mailing devices, at a total cost of approximately $300,000, and that they employ 428 persons at an annual salary roll of $433,000. If there is to be any supervision over departmental printing at all, it should include such substitute processes for printing.

I have here a few samples of periodicals that are now being mimeographed and multigraphed by the departments. For instance, here is the Quartermaster Service News for February, containing 62 mimeographed pages. Here is a bulletin issued by the Recruiting Publicity Bureau, of New York City, with a colored cover inclosing 24 pages of mimeographed work. Similar, also, are copies of the Army Recruiting News and various other publications which I have before me.

Mr. President, when 155 publications were ordered discontinued by the Joint Committee on Printing, what did some of the departments do? Did they stop issuing the periodical or magazine? No; they were issued just the same but were not printed; they were lithographed or mimeographed, costing the Government of the United States twice as much as they did before. But what do some officials care about a law Congress passes?

Mr. President, the time will come when an announcement that one is in sympathy with reforms will be understood by the people of the United States as meaning that the practices of the past and all the wicked waste on the part of the departments may go on unmolested. If Congress undertakes to pass legislation to prevent wicked waste or economize, some official will make the statement that he is in sympathy with the reform but does not like the legislation. If it reduces expenditures or limits appropriations, of course he does not like the legislation. Officials, with few exceptions, never do, for it interferes with the sweet will of the Government spenders. I know one thing. The time will come when the American people will see that a change is made. The taxpayers of this country are not going to allow this practice to continue, and Representatives or Senators who stand in the way of reforms of this character will hear from their constituents as soon as their constituents understand the situation.

Mr. President, since the committee began its investigation of mimeographing and multigraphing it has acquired a stack of exhibits of such work which would reach almost to the gallery of this Chamber if displayed in a pile, and that does not begin to cover the mass of such stuff with which the departments have swamped the mails and the newspaper offices of the country.

Since I made my last statement on the floor of the Senate in relation to the waste of print paper, I have received mail of every character from every part of the United States, from people sending me Government publications and telling me that they have been receiving them for years; that all they do with them is to throw them in the wastebasket, and pleading with me to see that the sending is discontinued. I do not believe there is a Senator who has not had similar experience.

For instance, I have here a so-called "Memo for the press," which the Secretary of the Navy issued to the newspapers last night, covering the statement which he expects to make to the Senate Subcommittee on Naval Affairs this afternoon. Without discussing the propriety of a witness sending out advance copies of testimony that he expects to give before a committee, I do not hesitate to say that there is not a newspaper in the country that could print one-tenth of the 61-paged "memo" which the Secretary of the Navy has submitted to the press for release "after he begins his fifth day's testimony."

The Comptroller of the Currency is also flooding the country with letters and circulars bombastically setting forth his marvelous administration of the banks. Not content with sending me one copy here in Washington, he also addressed a duplicate to Provo, with a request that an "answer would be appreciated."

The President bases his objection to section 8 on the further ground that it is an interference by the legislative branch of the Government on particularly departmental or administrative matters. In this he entirely overlooks the fact that the Joint Committee on Printing is not a committee of Congress as such but is a separate and distinct statutory body, and almost analogous to the Civil Service Commission or any other independent establishment of the Government. The membership and duties of the joint committee are fixed by law as set forth in the printing act of January 12, 1895. For many years, and without question heretofore, the committee has exercised many duties relating to printing for the departments as well as for Congress. The act of 1895 provides that the joint committee shall fix upon standards and award contracts for paper for printing for all branches of the Government service. The printing of the Agricultural Yearbook, prepared by the Department of Agriculture itself, is placed under the direction of the Joint Committee on Printing, as is also all printing for the Patent Office. The law also provides that even the annual reports of the executive offices shall be printed in a certain form unless otherwise provided by the Joint Committee on Printing.

As a matter of fact, the Government Printing Office was established by Congress as a congressional printing office. The printer was at first elected by both Houses of Congress, and was called the Congressional Printer. After a time some question was raised as to the constitutionality of Congress electing the printer, and his appointment was then vested in the President and the title changed to the Public Printer, but it does not appear that this was done with any intention by Congress of relinquishing its control over the Government Printing Office.

Further than the power of appointment, the President does not appear to have any control over the Public Printer, who makes his report direct to Congress. The printing act of 1895 and the many amendments to that law vest the Joint Committee on Printing with substantially the authority of a board of directors for the Government Printing Office. Its jurisdiction as such has never heretofore been questioned by any administration or any Congress.

Even the present building occupied by the Government Printing Office was erected by the Public Printer under the direction of the Joint Committee on Printing, as provided by law—Twenty-eighth Statute at Large, page 420—and the site it occupies was acquired by the committee under authority of a concurrent resolution of the Fifty-second Congress.

I am of the firm opinion, therefore, that the President has been deliberately misinformed concerning the duties and purposes of this committee, and that his advice did not come from qualified officers in the executive departments, but rather from outside influence, to which I have already referred. I shall take occasion in the very near future to advise the public as to the character of this influence.

The VICE PRESIDENT resumed the chair.

EDUCATIONAL SYSTEM AT WEST POINT.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the RECORD a letter from Mr. George M. Brown, of St. Louis, Mo., relative to the educational system at West Point.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CERTAIN-TEED PRODUCTS CORPORATION,
St. Louis, U. S. A., May 11, 1920.

Hon. SELDEN P. SPENCER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Yesterday's paper reported that Dr. Eliot, of Harvard, had complained of the educational system at West Point, and gave as proof the failure of West Point men during the war.

I wish to make an earnest protest against this claim of Dr. Eliot, both in regard to any failure of West Point men during the war and further in regard to the educational system at West Point.

As you will probably remember, I graduated at West Point in the class of 1890 and resigned after two years to enter business. In my business experience, which is extended throughout the world with this company, and is also extended to other various business interests, various patriotic organizations, war work, charity work, etc., I have come in contact with every kind of employer and employee and in contact with all kinds of people, both in public and private life.

As an employer we have dealt with graduates of practically all the well-known colleges. We have a number of Harvard men in the business, my son-in-law, Mr. R. M. Nelson, being a Harvard graduate and also secretary and treasurer of this business. My only son is a junior at Yale, so I am not lacking in appreciation of other colleges. I mean no disrespect to them when I go on record as saying I think there is no better line of education in any college than that given at West Point for meeting the problems which we must face in everyday life and under all sorts of conditions.

I will not undertake to go into my many reasons for feeling this way—my letter would have to be too long—but I do want to appear to be able to qualify as having a right to pass on such a matter, and then to add my testimony in the most favorable way possible to the West Point system of education and to West Point as an institution, and of course I am very proud of the record the West Point men made during the war. Their losses in battle in percentage, I believe, were at high-water mark of any known class entering the war. I haven't the figures on this, but understand there are such figures available at West Point, and I am sure their losses were not sustained without a corresponding showing of good results.

I would greatly appreciate it if you could present West Point's case in some way in this matter. Having graduated at Yale yourself, it would be most appropriate if you can do this.

Very truly, yours, GEO. M. BROWN.

PERSONNEL OF THE NAVY AND COAST GUARD—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. PAGE submitted the following conference report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 11927) to increase the efficiency of the personnel of the Navy and Coast Guard through the temporary provision of bonuses

"SEC. 10. That any enlisted man or apprentice seaman who shall reenlist in the Navy within one year from the date of his discharge therefrom shall, upon such reenlistment, be entitled to and shall receive the same benefits as are now authorized by law for reenlistment within four months from date of last discharge from the service: Provided, That this section shall become inoperative six months after the date of the approval of this act.

"SEC. 11. That, in lieu of compensation now prescribed by law, commissioned officers of the Coast and Geodetic Survey shall receive the same pay and allowances as now are or hereafter may be prescribed for officers of the Navy with whom they hold relative rank, as prescribed in the act of May 22, 1917, entitled 'An act to temporarily increase the commissioned and warrant and enlisted strength of the Navy and Marine Corps, and for other purposes,' including longevity; and all laws relating to the retirement of commissioned officers of the Navy shall hereafter apply to commissioned officers of the Coast and Geodetic Survey: Provided, That hereafter longevity pay for officers in the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, Coast Guard, Public Health Service, and Coast and Geodetic Survey shall be based on the total of all service in any or all of said services.

"SEC. 12. That hereafter when any commissioned officer, noncommissioned officer of the grade of color sergeant and above, including any noncommissioned officer of the Marine Corps of corresponding grade, warrant officer, chief petty officer, or petty officer (first class), having a wife or dependent child or children, is ordered to make a permanent change of station, the United States shall furnish transportation in kind from funds appropriated for the transportation of the Army, the Navy, the Marine Corps, the Coast Guard, the Coast and Geodetic Survey, and the Public Health Service to his new station for the wife and dependent child or children: Provided, That for persons in the naval service the term 'permanent station,' as used in this section, shall be interpreted to mean a shore station or the home yard of the vessel to which the person concerned may be ordered; and a duly authorized change in home yard or home port of such vessel shall be deemed a change of station: Provided further, That if the cost of such transportation exceeds that for transportation from the old to the new station the excess cost shall be paid to the United States by the officer concerned: Provided further, That transportation supplied the wife or dependent child or children of such officer to or from stations beyond the continental limits of the United States shall not be other than by Government transport, if such transportation is available: And provided further, That the personnel of the Navy shall have the benefit of all existing laws applying to the Army and the Marine Corps for the transportation of household effects.

"SEC. 13. That the provisions of sections 1, 3, 4, 5, and 6 of this act shall remain effective until the close of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, unless sooner amended or repealed: Provided, That the rates of pay prescribed in sections 4 and 6 hereof shall be the rates of pay during the current enlistment of all men in active service on the date of the approval of this act, and for those who enlist, reenlist, or extend their enlistments prior to July 1, 1922, for the term of such enlistment, reenlistment, or extended enlistment: Provided further, That the increases provided in this act shall not enter into the computation of the retired pay of officers or enlisted men who may be retired prior to July 1, 1922: And provided further, That a special committee, to be composed of five Members of the Senate, to be appointed by the Vice President, and five Members of the House of Representatives, to be appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives, shall make an investigation and report recommendations to their respective Houses not later than the first Monday in January, 1922, relative to the readjustment of the pay and allowances of the commissioned and enlisted personnel of the several services herein mentioned.

"SEC. 14. That nothing contained in this act shall operate to reduce the pay or allowances of any officer or enlisted man on the active or retired list: Provided, That the allowances and gratuities now authorized by existing law are not changed hereby, except as otherwise specified in this act.

"SEC. 15. That the appropriations 'Pay of the Navy, 1920,' and 'Pay, Marine Corps, 1920,' are hereby made available for any of the expenses authorized by this act, and any part or all of the appropriations 'Provisions, Navy, 1920,' and 'Maintenance, Quartermaster's Department, Marine Corps, 1920,' not required for the objects of expenditure specified in said appropriations, may be transferred to the appropriations 'Pay of the Navy, 1920,' or 'Pay, Marine Corps, 1920,' respectively, as may be required."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate to the title of the bill, and agree to the same.

C. S. PAGE,
JOHN WALTER SMITH,
HENRY W. KEYES,
J. W. WADSWORTH, Jr.,
GEO. E. CHAMBERLAIN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

THOMAS S. BUTLER,
PATRICK H. KELLEY,
FRED A. BRITTEN,
L. P. PADGETT,
D. J. RIORDAN,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. PAGE. I understand that the conference report received the unanimous sanction of the members of the conference committee of both Houses, and that when the matter was brought up in the House this morning it was agreed to without a single objection. It is an important measure and ought to receive immediate consideration. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate may consider the conference report at this time.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I ask the Senator from Vermont if this is not also a report on the Army pay bill.

Mr. PAGE. It is.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Does the Senator state that there was no difference between the conferees and that it is a unanimous report?

Mr. PAGE. It is a unanimous report on the part of the conferees of both Houses, and the conference report was agreed to in the House this morning without a single objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is it not a report on the Army, Navy, and Coast Guard bill?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It is my understanding that the Army is included in the measure.

Mr. PAGE. That was taken care of in the amendment. In the original bill the Army pay was stricken out.

Mr. LODGE. It consolidated both bills.

The report was agreed to.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the peace resolution may be temporarily laid aside and that the Senate may proceed to the consideration of the merchant-marine bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10378) to provide for the promotion and maintenance of the American merchant marine, to repeal certain emergency legislation, and provide for the disposition, regulation, and use of property acquired thereunder, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment proposing to insert a new section, to be known as section 32.

Mr. JONES of Washington. On page 35, line 21, after the word "mortgage," I desire to offer an amendment to make it consistent with other parts of the bill. I move to insert after the word "mortgage" the words "on the hold of any vessel," so as to make the line read:

Shall be subordinate to the lien of any mortgage on the hold of any vessel duly recorded—

And so forth.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I desire to offer a further amendment to the section. I move that each paragraph be lettered (a), (b), (c), (d), and so forth. That will enable us to deal with the paragraphs more easily in the future. In other words, in section 32, line 6, page 35, insert the small letter "a" in parentheses and then at the beginning of the next paragraph to insert the small letter "b" in parentheses, and so on for each paragraph of the section.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the paragraphs will be accordingly lettered. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 49, after line 11, to insert:

SEC. 33. That section 4530 of the Revised Statutes of the United States is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 4530. Every seaman on a vessel of the United States shall be entitled to receive on demand from the master of the vessel to which he belongs one-half part of the balance of his wages earned and remaining unpaid at the time when such demand is made at every port where such vessel, after the voyage has been commenced, shall load or deliver cargo or take in fuel before the voyage is ended, and all stipulations in the contract to the contrary shall be void: Provided, Such a demand shall not be made before the expiration of nor oftener than once in five days nor more than once in the same harbor on the same entry. Any failure on the part of the master to comply with this demand shall release the seaman from his contract, and he shall be entitled to full payment of wages earned. And when the voyage is ended every such seaman shall be entitled to the remainder of the wages which shall be then due him, as provided in section 4529 of the Revised Statutes: Provided further, That notwithstanding any release signed by any seaman under section 4552 of the Revised Statutes any court having jurisdiction may upon good cause shown set aside such release and take such action as justice shall require: And provided further, That this section shall apply to seamen on foreign vessels while in harbors of the United States, and the courts of the United States shall be open to such seamen for its enforcement."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment is agreed to, without objection.

Mr. KING. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee to state in what respect the amendment reported by the committee differs from existing law?

Mr. JONES of Washington. It differs from the existing law only in one main particular, in about the fourth or fifth line of the section. The present law reads as follows:

Every seaman on a vessel of the United States shall be entitled to receive on demand from the master of the vessel to which he belongs—

Now, here is the part affected—

one-half part of the wages which he shall have then earned, at every port which such vessel—

And so forth. The change is:

One-half part of the balance of his wages earned and remaining unpaid.

That was the real intent of the law originally; that is what its framers thought they were doing; but the Supreme Court, while it held this section to be constitutional and that we could make it apply to foreign vessels and foreign seamen in our ports, held that the language of the present law requires one-half of the wages of the entire voyage to be kept, as the seamen express it, "with the ship" until the end of the voyage. The purpose of this amendment is to carry out the real, original intention, that whenever a seaman can make such a demand he can demand half of what is then due and remaining unpaid. That is the main provision. It is very earnestly desired by the seamen, and there is no serious objection on the part of those who operate ships.

As a matter of fact, the provision is designed to meet this situation with reference to foreign seamen. They make a contract in a foreign country for a voyage sometimes extending over three years, but under the decision referred to they can not draw on that whole voyage any more than one-half of the entire wages agreed to be paid for the voyage; in other words, the operators hold half the wages and force the sailor to go back to his home port. This provision is to enable a seaman on a foreign ship who desires to land in this country to have one-half of the wages that are remaining unpaid paid to him. It will tend to bring the foreign seamen up to a level with our seamen by giving them the remedy here in our own ports that our seamen have.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator say that the Supreme Court has held that we have jurisdiction over the foreign seamen and foreign ships?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Under the present statute we have such jurisdiction in our ports.

The Supreme Court held that act to be unconstitutional only a short time ago.

Mr. KING. A vessel, then, that sails under the Norwegian flag, for instance, with Norwegian sailors, if it touched at an American port for a day would become subject to the jurisdiction of our courts and the provisions of this proposed law, and the sailors could invoke the law for their protection?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes; while in an American port. It was one of the main contentions, the Senator from Utah will remember, in favor of the seamen's act, that it would, instead of placing a great burden on our seamen and shippers, bring the wages of the seamen of other countries up to a level with our own. This provision is intended to aid in carrying out that great purpose.

NATIONAL PROHIBITION.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, a day or two ago the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] asked and obtained permission to place in the RECORD the brief and argument of the complainant in the New Jersey prohibition case. I now ask permission to put in the RECORD the opposing brief filed by Wayne B. Wheeler and others.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], who is the objector to such papers being inserted in the RECORD, is not present. He was not here at the time the Senator from New Jersey secured permission to place in the RECORD the brief to which the Senator from Texas refers. If he had been here, the request would have been objected to I am sure. I am informed by the Senator from Utah that the cost of printing that brief in the RECORD, it covering some 24 pages, was very large. I wish the Senator from Texas would withhold his request until the Senator from Utah is present.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I would not have offered the brief in this instance, if the brief on the other side had not been placed in the RECORD.

Mr. KENYON. That is the trouble with printing in the RECORD of such documents. The printing of one brief draws out a brief on the other side.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I agree with the Senator from Iowa as to that.

Mr. SMOOT entered the Chamber.

Mr. KENYON. The Senator from Utah is now present, and I wish to call his attention to the request of the Senator from Texas. I am holding the matter up until the Senator from Utah can have an opportunity to object to the request granted, if he so desires.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator from Texas at what time the brief presented by the Senator from New Jersey, to which he refers, was printed in the RECORD?

Mr. SHEPPARD. It was printed only a few days ago.

Mr. SIMMONS. Did not the Senator at that time state that he would not object to the printing of that brief in the RECORD provided that it was agreed that he might thereafter offer the opposing briefs and have them printed in the RECORD? I ask the Senator from Texas if that was not the understanding?

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Texas did offer briefs, and they went into the RECORD at the same time.

Mr. SIMMONS. He is asking that they go in now.

Mr. SMOOT. This is another matter?

Mr. SIMMONS. The present request has to do with another brief?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes. I will say frankly to the Senator from Texas that if I had been in the Chamber the other day when the Senator from New Jersey offered the New Jersey briefs for printing in the RECORD I should have objected to their going in.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, let me explain the situation. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] first offered the brief of Hon. Elihu Root in one of the prohibition cases. I then asked permission to insert all the opposing briefs, but afterwards decided to have only one inserted. A day or two ago the Senator from New Jersey put in the brief which had been filed in the New Jersey case, which was a separate case from the other. I now merely ask that the opposing brief be put in, in order that both sides may be treated fairly.

I would not, in the first instance, have asked that any of these briefs go into the RECORD, I will say to the Senator from Utah. If he will remember, I first offered the briefs and asked that they be referred to the Senate Committee on Printing to be made a Senate document. The Committee on Printing made a favorable report on the request, but the Senate failed to adopt it and I had nothing further to say. The Senator from Connecticut then rose and said he would read the brief of Mr. Elihu Root unless it be allowed to be printed in the RECORD. I have been actuated only by a desire to see both sides represented fairly.

Mr. SMOOT. I think they were represented at that time fairly.

Mr. SHEPPARD. That is true, so far as the first case is concerned. Now, in the second case, the brief for the complainant has been published, but not the opposing brief.

Mr. SMOOT. It cost a thousand dollars for postage and to print the brief in the New Jersey case under the situation existing to-day. I am going to ask the Senator from Texas not to ask that the document to which he has referred be printed in the RECORD. I wish to say to the Senator and to the Senate that I do not know where we are going to get paper enough to meet the demands. We are doing everything in our power to provide paper; we are holding up the printing of some documents and printing them only in small quantities and just as they are distributed, at an expense of from 25 to 33⅓ per cent more than would be involved if we could get the paper and print the documents all at once.

Mr. SHEPPARD. The Senator does not direct any criticism against me for the course I have pursued?

Mr. SMOOT. Not at all; but I wish to say that under the circumstances I will have to object to the document being incorporated in the RECORD.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Under the circumstances I shall not insist on the incorporation of the brief in the RECORD.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I do not desire in any way to continue the discussion of the printing controversy, because a very important matter, namely, the merchant marine bill, is before the Senate; but in the defense of the request which I made on behalf of the State of New Jersey I wish to say just a word.

So far as I am concerned, I am perfectly satisfied to have the Senator from Texas place in the RECORD the brief in answer to the brief put in by me, but as he has already had printed in the RECORD a general answer perhaps that meets the necessity of that side of the question.

In explanation of my request to put the brief and complaint of the attorney general representing the State of New Jersey in the RECORD, I desire to say that it is not a question in my mind at all of the issue that happens to be argued in that particular case. I am not a lawyer, but from various expressions on the part of distinguished lawyers and after reading the document from a layman's standpoint, it is my conviction that that brief and complaint furnish to the country the most concise review of the principle of State rights that has in recent times been put together; and, with all due deference to the importance of many speeches made on the floor of the Senate which have filled columns and columns of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I believe that the people of this country will be as much interested to have the opportunity of reading in concise form a general review of the precedents with the interpretations made by the attorney general bearing on the great question of State rights, which question is involved in so much of our legislation. In that aspect the documents I have had printed are very important for the information of the American people. So I have no apology to make for using a portion of the RECORD in order that the people of this country may have that opportunity.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I think that these matters should go into the RECORD for the enlightenment of the people. And while the Senator from Utah is so watchful as to economy and is trying to save so much money for the Government in the matter of printing, I wish to call his attention and the attention of the country to the fact that I have received no less than a dozen such cards as this [exhibiting] carried through the mail under the frank of a Republican Member of Congress, signed by the League for the Preservation of American Independence (Inc.), Washington, D. C., and marked "From the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD."

In big type it says:

Let us have peace.

And then under that it says:

The President said to Congress on November 12, 1919, that the war was ended, and its object accomplished—

And so forth.

Further down it asks the question in big black type:

Will the South stand for this?

Saying:

Out of that great section of the country came most of the creative genius that secured our independence, founded our Government, and framed our institutions.

What, now, would those great southern statesmen say to the proposal that their work, the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution of the United States, be so far undone that the Old World shall again be given control of the New?

Then the next paragraph is italicized; evidently they thought it was very important—

Would they approve the surrender at Versailles of the independence they had won at Yorktown? Will you?

What, then, is to be done?

Then it says:

Let Congress declare the state of war ended.

That is proposed to be done in the Knox resolution, I believe, which has the sanction of the Senator from Utah, perhaps.

Let the Senate declare the terms upon which we will enter again into relations with Germany and Austria.

Let Congress declare our intention to avoid foreign entanglements, as Washington and other Presidents have advised, and redeclare our independence of foreign control.

Then let us have peace!

They underscore that.

If you approve, say so promptly to your Senators and Representatives at Washington.

Then, in big, black type at the end, are the words:

League for the Preservation of American Independence (Inc.), Washington, D. C.

I know not how many thousands or tens of thousands or perhaps hundreds of thousands of these circulars, at the cost of an immense amount of money, have been distributed from one end of this country to the other; but I know that in my own State thousands of them have gone through the mail, at Government expense, under the frank of a Republican Member of Congress. If you want to economize, preach some of that kind of economy to members of the Republican Party.

In the first place, the circular is unfair, and in my opinion it is just as reprehensible as for candidates to spend immense amounts of money in presidential primaries throughout the country by employing men to go around to get voters to the polls to vote for them. That is, of course, a species of corruption; but it is no greater than with Government funds, through the frank of a Member of Congress or a Member of the Senate, to send such literature as this through the mails; and I want to insert this whole pamphlet in my few remarks.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Feb. 25, 1920.]

LET US HAVE PEACE.

The President told Congress on November 12, 1919, that the war was ended and its object accomplished.

This was true then, and it is true now. But the President refuses to end the state of war and surrender the restrictive war-time measures still in his hands, which menace farm, shop, and office in every section of the country.

He refuses to end the state of war unless the Nation shall enter into a contract with 32 nations—many of which are brown, yellow, or black—under which our domestic policy and foreign relations shall be subjected to the control of these nations, and American troops be placed at their disposal for use in Europe, Asia, and Africa, to be employed in never-ceasing warfare.

A coalition of patriotic southern and northern Senators has refused thus to surrender American sovereignty or to expend American blood and tax money.

These Senators have sought to modify the contract so that we shall be enabled to do our international duty as our Nation thinks best without placing the United States in Europe's hands to be dealt with as Europe pleases.

But the President refuses to Americanize the covenant and declines to curtail the supersovereign powers of the league. He must have his league or there will be no peace, he says in effect.

The Nation must bow down to the President's league or continue suspended in a state of war. He thus hangs up America by the thumbs and coolly awaits its repentance and acquiescence.

WILL THE SOUTH STAND FOR THIS?

Out of that great section of the country came most of the creative genius that secured our independence, founded our Government, and framed our institutions.

What, now, would those great southern statesmen say to the proposal that their work, the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution of the United States, be so far undone that the Old World shall again be given control of the New?

Would they approve the surrender at Versailles of the independence they had won at Yorktown? Will you?

What, then, is to be done?

This:

Let Congress declare the state of war ended.

Let the Senate declare the terms upon which we will enter again into relations with Germany and Austria.

Let Congress declare our intention to avoid foreign entanglements, as Washington and other Presidents have advised, and redeclare our independence of foreign control.

THEN LET US HAVE PEACE!

If you approve, say so promptly to your Senators and Representatives at Washington.

LEAGUE FOR THE PRESERVATION OF AMERICAN INDEPENDENCE (INC.),
Washington, D. C.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, under the law, anything that is printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD can be sent through the mails free of charge. I do not know whether the Senator from Mississippi ever used the mails for the distribution of documents or not, and I do not care, as far as that is concerned, whether he has in the past or not; but there is not a Congressman and there is not a Senator but that knows that the committee has told the Public Printer, in connection with the printing of speeches from now on, that if the paper situation is such that he can not furnish paper he is to refuse to print them.

I have seen—and this applies both to Democrats and to Republicans—carloads of public documents sold for old paper. They used to print so many of them that they could not send them through the mails. They did not have large enough mailing lists, I suppose. I have seen them loaded here by the car, not to be sent through the post office here at Washington, as most of the mail is, but they are delivered directly to cars and sent all over this country. If the Senator wants to know how much of this is going on, just let him find out from the man that buys as old print paper the public documents that are out of use, and let him go over to the House and go to the waste room and see what is there to-day. I want to stop it all.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me——

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON. I think the Senator has rendered great service and has saved quite a good deal of money for the Government in objecting at times to certain things going in the RECORD, and in discontinuing certain periodicals that are of no use, and I can not believe that the Senator approves of placing in the RECORD matter of this kind—and this was placed in the RECORD, I may say, by this particular Congressman, or some Congressman—and then, at Government expense, under the frank of a Member of Congress or a Senator, distributing such literature as that through the country.

Mr. SMOOT. Why, Mr. President, I have stood upon this floor time and time again, and perhaps have violated the rules of this body in referring to speeches that have been put into the RECORD in years past by virtue of requests to print; and if the Senator will take up the RECORD at almost any time, and look at the back of the RECORD almost any day, he will find those same speeches being printed to-day. We do not have that practice in the Senate. We can stop it here, and it ought to be stopped in the House.

Mr. HARRISON. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. Then, under the law, when it goes into the RECORD, no matter what it may be, any Congressman or any Senator can order from the Government Printing Office what he wants, and it can go through the mails free of charge. Now, if we want to pass a law—and I do not know but that it would be a good thing—to take away the free circulation of documents through the mails from Congressmen and from Senators, well and good; but I do not want to be blamed for a thing that the law says a man can do, and he does it, whether it is right or whether it is wrong.

Mr. HARRISON. I will say to the Senator that I do not know it to be a fact, but I suspect that the particular Congressman whose frank is there did not send out that circular, and had nothing to do with it, but perhaps loaned his frank, so to speak, and allowed the League for the Preservation of American Independence (Inc.), here in Washington, D. C., to use it. It is wrong; it is outrageous; it is indefensible. It shows to what extremity the opponents of the League of Nations have gone.

Mr. SMOOT. That has been the practice ever since I have been here, and I know that it was the practice before I came here. The Congressman had to order the printing done, however. No association could have ordered them printed. The Congressman must take the responsibility, because in ordering them he must issue the order, and he must pay for the printing of them under the law, and he does. I have thought many a time of the question as to whether the abuse is not a greater evil than the good that comes from the privilege.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, in view of the eulogy by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] on the brief that he put in the RECORD, I think it but fair that a synopsis of the brief I offered should go in the RECORD. I shall prepare that synopsis and present it to the Senate myself, as soon as I can do it.

The prohibition amendment was submitted to the States under the method prescribed in the Constitution itself, under the method prescribed by the States themselves when they created the Constitution. That amendment was ratified by 45 of the 48 States of this Union, and the assertion that it is in violation of State rights seems to me to border upon the absurd. It seems to me that the State of New Jersey, in resisting the action of 45 of the 48 States of the Union in ratifying an amendment proposed under the Constitution, and adopted in accordance with its solemn terms, has put itself on the side of revolution and anarchy.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is a rule of the Senate that prevents a Senator from making remarks about a State of the Union.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I do not believe it represents the feeling of the people of New Jersey. I want to apologize to the State of New Jersey.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator must withdraw that remark or take his seat.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I could say something, but I refrain, that immediately comes to my mind as I recall certain assertions that recently have been made by distinguished authority in an adjoining State.

The contention in the brief presented by the Senator from New Jersey is not representative of the State of New Jersey, I hope and believe. I refuse to believe that he represents the people of New Jersey if he says that they are really behind a contention resisting the solemn action of 45 of the 48 States of the American Union, acting under the method prescribed in the Constitution itself.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, again I apologize for taking the time of the Senate, but the Senator from Texas has introduced a very unnecessary and unfortunate angle into the discussion. Allow me to repeat for his benefit, if he did not understand the preliminary remarks I made in connection with the introduction of the brief and complaint, that it was not at all, so far as my presentation of it was concerned, with any particular reference to the particular question involved. I am ready to discuss the particular question involved at any time on a proper occasion, or whenever legislation is pending; but this brief, as I followed it, presents all elements, all viewpoints, many precedents in connection with the rights of the State in its relation to the Nation. It reviewed, I think, without doing so in a manner that could in any way offend even those who earnestly and sincerely believe in the strictest interpretation of the eighteenth amendment, the question of State rights, of State police power, of States' relationship to Government, and did so in a dispassionate manner and in a way that I feel should be presented to the people of the country, not because of its relationship to that particular issue, but because of its relationship to many questions that are daily coming before the Senate of the United States in the matter of State rights as compared to Federal rights.

Since my brief membership in this body I recall subject after subject that has been discussed on the floor of the Senate where the question has arisen whether the Senate of the United States or the Congress of the United States were not invading State rights, and undertaking to assert action in a way that had heretofore been looked upon as entirely within the control of the States. This brief and complaint attempted to review that general situation, and I think it is entirely out of place to raise any question as to the feeling of the people of New Jersey on the prohibition issue, or that it be introduced in any way into the discussion.

The brief was prepared by the attorney general of the State of New Jersey, following action of the Legislature of New Jersey, representing a sovereign State of the Union; and it undoubtedly represented, through the legislature, the desire of the people of that great Commonwealth. I strongly resent such aspersions and feel that it is unnecessary and entirely out of place to question in any way the feeling of the people of New Jersey, because that particular question is involved.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for just a question?

Mr. EDGE. I am through.

Mr. KING. I want to ask the Senator, with his permission, if he did not know that it was against this doctrine that is now so prevalent, this new federalism, that the States should assert any rights whatever? The new federalism commands that the States shall abdicate all their functions, sit down supinely, and let bureaus and bureaucratic institutions and instrumentalities and Federal agencies and parasites operate the States.

I think the Senator ought not to declare in favor of the rights of the States. He ought to come with cap in hand and welcome this new doctrine, and bow at the feet of this new federalism.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I am very glad—following the thought of the Senator from Utah—that one State in the Union, at least, even though she may be criticized, is not deterred because of the viewpoint of others, and that one State of the Union, at least—one sovereign State, through its regular legal department—is testing to some extent the question of State rights, and its own jurisdiction in its relationship to the Government.

RATES OF INTEREST.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, on May 5 the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN], the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency, had printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a letter addressed to me by Mr. W. P. G. Harding, governor of the Federal Reserve Board, on the question of interest rates.

For some time I had been trying to bring about a reduction of interest rates in the United States. I thought that the high rates fixed by the Federal Reserve Board of 6 and 7 per cent to the member banks necessarily had the effect of causing the member banks to raise their rates 2 and 3 per cent higher than the rates fixed by the reserve banks. Undoubtedly that is the fact. The current commercial rates are running now 8 and 10 per cent, not to mention commissions on the side; and I know of transactions involving a much higher rate and dealing with large amounts. Even acceptances that ought to have a 3 per cent rate are over 6 per cent.

There is an urgent demand for credit at this time for various purposes, for productive purposes, for commercial purposes, for purposes of distribution of the goods required by this country as well as for speculative purposes. There is an extraordinary demand, and it is natural that the banks should take advantage of that great demand to raise the rate, because, like merchants who are selling credits, they sell at the best figure they can, and when the urgent demand comes they will raise the rates as thrifty merchants of credit might do, or just as those who sell eggs might do, for that matter.

The Federal Reserve Board, however, is a Federal agency; and I desire to invite the attention of the Senate to the fact that the Federal Reserve System was intended to give stability to credit, and should not, like a private agency, be used merely as a money-making bank for profit.

It was intended to promote uniform, reasonable rates of interest to the business men of the United States, and these high interest rates which are being authorized by the Federal Reserve Board, I think, are very harmful in their consequences.

The Federal Reserve Board is thinking much these days of deflating credit. The idea has been much exploited recently that it is a good thing to deflate credit; that there is too much credit; that credit is going too far; that it is leading to speculation of all kinds and, therefore, we must deflate credit. I will agree that when credit is being used for speculative purposes, when credit is being used to speculate in commodities for hoarding, when it is used for speculating in real estate, or when it is used for the speculation in investment securities on the stock exchange by buying stocks for the rise or selling stocks for the fall, used in that way, when there is a scarcity of credits for productive and distributive purposes, it would be well to have such credit, as far as possible, transferred from unproductive to productive purposes and in that sense deflated. But the reserve board in raising the rate to 6 and 7 per cent upon all classes of credit is not stopping speculation. The speculator can better pay an artificially high rate than the man who is engaged in a normal business can pay it, because the speculator has a speculative profit in sight.

When this sweeping raise is made over the whole country a raise of 2 or 3 per cent on the volume of all loans in the United States, amounting to many billions, it will result in an increased charge on the cost of living of between one and two billion dollars.

I am opposed to the Federal reserve banks being administered merely as a bank president or a cashier would administer this system; that is, from the standpoint of profit alone.

I fully agree that when the New York Stock Exchange raises the rate to 20 and 30 per cent and the Federal Reserve Board raises its rate to 6 per cent and 7 per cent and the member banks raise their interest rates to 8 and 10 per cent, it does depress and deflate credit in fact; it deflates the credit of the United States; it deflates the value of the Liberty bonds, and the bonds have gone down now in some cases as much as 15 per cent. There has been a loss to the bondholders of this country on those Liberty bonds and Victory bonds to the amount of nearly $3,000,000,000, and I object to it. I earnestly object to the policy which permits it.

I object also to the Federal reserve banks being administered in such a way that they shall be open to the charge of profiteering. The New York Federal Reserve Bank made 110 per cent last year on a 4 per cent rate. Now, this rate is raised to 6 per cent. They should make on that basis, they will make on that basis, between 160 and 180 per cent, if they transact a like volume of business this year.

I say that that sets a bad example. I say that the Federal reserve banks were not established as money-making banks. I say that the member bank which pays its depositor 2 and 3 and 4 per cent, and loans money out at 5, 6, and 7 per cent, has a margin of approximately 3 per cent on the deposits.

The Federal reserve banks do not pay anything on their deposits, and if they took the same margin of profit that a national or State bank does, they should be content with 3 per cent. It is said that if they loaned the money out at a low rate, they would be overwhelmed with applications. They are overwhelmed with applications anyway, and the reserve banks and member banks should discriminate and give the preference to applications that relate to production and legitimate, useful business, and do so at a fair rate, at a normal 3 per cent rate.

The reserve banks are administered by men of ability, courage, and discretion, and when they pass on applications they should discriminate, and they actually do that very thing.

It is not necessary to put the rate up to keep them from being stampeded. If they are the right men, they can not be induced to make loans that are not justified by the individual facts.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will it disturb the Senator to ask him a question?

Mr. OWEN. Not at all.

Mr. KING. If I understand the Senator correctly, his contention is that there has been perhaps too much loaning for speculative purposes, too much credit. I ask for information, because the Senator is a profound student of this question. How would it be possible to differentiate between the borrowers so as to restrict the loans made by the banks to what might be denominated legitimate, bona fide purposes, in contradistinction to speculative purposes?

Mr. OWEN. Whenever a bank makes a loan, it makes a loan to an individual, who presents himself for the loan, with his collateral, and it is entirely competent for the bank—and every bank actually exercises its power and its own judgment and uses its discretion with regard to every loan—whether it will make it or whether it will not make it. The bank officers know perfectly well, and if they do not know they can ascertain, whether that loan is going to be used for speculative purposes, or whether it is to be used for the normal business of the country, for production, for distribution. So it is, after all, left to the discriminative judgment of the reserve bank, when it deals with a member bank, to know whether the loans are being used for covering excessive speculative loans, which might be deflated, or whether they are being used for the normal business of the country.

When this country needs, above everything else in the world, to stimulate production, the interest rates ought not to be raised. The Bank of England does not raise interest rates upon its productive forces, or its merchants, and the Bank of England, which is the wisest bank in the world, from a merchant's standpoint, is administered by the greatest merchants in the world. The London banks had an established 3½ per cent rate on acceptances during the Great War, when the British Empire was paying 5 per cent for loans.

The Bank of England raises the interest at times to attract gold, for the English banks carry very little surplus gold, while we carry the largest in the world.

The United States has $3,160,000,000 of gold and all the balance of the world has about $4,600,000,000.

The Entente debt to the United States would consume twice the amount of gold the world has in order to pay it. Our excess commodity exports in a single year would nearly consume the world's gold supply if paid in gold.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I agree substantially with everything the Senator says, and I am in harmony with his statements, so often made here of late, against the determination or policy of the Federal reserve banks to increase their interest rates to the disadvantage of those who are entitled to borrow. But the Senator knows that banks are so eager to make loans if they can go to the Federal reserve and rediscount the paper, that unless something is done either to check rediscount by the Federal reserve banks, or to impose limitations and restrictions upon the banks with respect to the credit which they will extend, this policy will be continued ad infinitum.

Mr. OWEN. The officers of the reserve banks can easily prevent the abuse of those who are too aggressive, for instance.

The practice of the Federal reserve banks is so adjusted as to penalize a particular bank which imposes upon the Federal reserve banks in overdrafts. They arrange the rate on a bank indulging in overdrafts on the Federal reserve bank from a normal rate up to 10 per cent. It is perfectly competent for the reserve bank to defend itself against an improper overdraft on the part of a member bank. It is perfectly easy for the reserve bank to say to a member bank which imposes upon the reserve bank, "I will charge you an individual rate higher than the normal rate." But when a member bank comes to the Federal reserve bank, which has not used its deposits with the reserve bank at all, and asks to borrow a part of its own reserve, the reserve bank ought to be content with a rate such as a member bank earns for itself on a depositor who comes and borrows money from the bank.

I may have money on deposit on time with a member bank, and that is an actual fact. I have money now on deposit with a bank at 4 per cent. That bank charges me 7 for a loan I want temporarily. I think it is quite fair, and I am perfectly willing to pay the 3 per cent. But if I am a bank and I have a deposit with the reserve bank, and I go there and they pay me nothing on my deposits, 3 per cent is a reasonable rate for them to charge me. I will say to the Senator that Belgium had a 3 per cent rate for 50 years without a single break prior to the great World War. They do not pay in Belgium interest on deposits. France had a 3 per cent rate for 50 years before this war. Three per cent United States bonds before the war were above par. American banks only pay 2 and 3 per cent for the loan of deposits. I object to the Federal reserve act being administered in such a way as to encourage high rates of interest and thus tax and depress the productive powers of the American people at this time.

I gladly give the reserve board credit for the highest and best purposes. I do not wish to be understood as criticizing their motive in any way whatever. I am personally very friendly to its members. I am only calling the attention of the country to the fact that there should be no deflation of credit required for productive purposes at this time, when the whole world knows that the most important of all things is increased production. That is what the world wants. The very thing which is necessary to reduce the high cost of living is to increase production; and when you raise the rates to a prohibitive point you are putting a brake upon production; and that is what I strenuously object to.

I object to these artificial high rates on the New York Stock Exchange on call loans. The call loan ought to be at a very low rate, because it is payable on demand, and has behind it abundant security. But these rates have been going from 8 per cent to as high as 30 per cent, and it is advertised in all of the daily papers throughout the United States that the rates are going from 8 per cent to 30 per cent on call.

What is the effect of that? The effect is to make the country think that credit is impossible in New York. It is to make the country think that this country is going into a panic, and there is talk now, all over the country, because of these artificially high rates, that the country is going into an industrial depression. There is no need on earth for this country to go into any industrial depression. The only way the country can be forced into an industrial depression is by these artificial, fluctuating, high rates of interest which put men in jeopardy who are engaged in production.

The Federal reserve banks have over $2,000,000,000 in gold and a reserve of over 40 per cent. They have an elastic system, and to the extent that credits are actually and positively needed for productive purposes they can supply the credits that are needed to the member banks, and they need not fear to lower the reserves for this purpose.

Moreover, the productive capacity of the United States last year was over $65,000,000,000, and the investing purchasing power of the people can easily take up in due season the present investment securities now held on speculative loans and clear the banks of such loans. There is therefore no need to refuse loans that are truly for genuine production and distribution or to impose repressive and alarming rates of interest that may break down confidence and invite industrial depression.

This is a matter of ordinary, common, horse sense, and the Senate of the United States and the business men of the Nation ought to take notice of what is going on in regard to this question.

I called attention to these high rates a short time ago and received a report upon it, which is before the Senate. There ought to be passed by this body an act that would stop violent fluctuations of interest on the New York Stock Exchange. The effect is that the rate goes up to 15 or 20 per cent and draws money to New York from Texas, Iowa, Illinois, and from Kansas. It comes from Kansas City, New Orleans, Dallas, Atlanta, and from St. Louis; it comes from different centers of the country to New York for speculating on Wall Street in the stock market instead of being used by manufacturers and business men.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TOWNSEND in the chair). Does the Senator yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. OWEN. I yield.

Mr. CURTIS. I rose to ask the Senator if he does not know that money had been taken out of the Kansas City banks and that the farmers of Kansas and the farmers of Oklahoma are now in great need of credit?

Mr. OWEN. Assuredly I know it, and that is what I am objecting to. When you permit high rates, going up to 20 and 30 per cent in New York on call, of course the western banks, and southern banks, for that matter, send their money there to be loaned on call, and remove it from productive processes, and then the banks, seeing the urgent demand, raise the rates to 8 and 10 per cent on legitimate business.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator what effect the usury laws of the States have upon the high rates, as measuring the ability of a member bank in a State where they have a usury law to borrow at all from a Federal reserve bank.

Mr. OWEN. The State laws do undertake to restrict usury, of course. The ordinary rate is 6 per cent. Some States permit contracts to go up to 10 per cent. The banks have an ingenious way of avoiding that when they see fit by buying paper which has already been created, but if the reserve rate is 6 per cent and——

Mr. SIMMONS. That is not exactly what I had in mind. I understood the Senator to say that the reserve banks had now fixed 7 per cent as the loaning rate.

Mr. OWEN. Six and seven per cent. They charge the 7 per cent where the member bank puts up the bonds of the War Finance Corporation as security.

Mr. SIMMONS. And 7 per cent under some other conditions?

Mr. OWEN. Seven per cent under that condition.

Mr. SIMMONS. Suppose a State has a usury law, as my State has, limiting to 6 per cent the rate of interest that may be charged, how can a member bank in that State borrow money from a Federal reserve bank at even 6 per cent?

Mr. OWEN. The penalty is not inflicted on the borrower but on the lender.

Mr. SIMMONS. I understand that. The Senator did not catch what I said. In my State a bank is not permitted to charge more than 6 per cent for money that it loans.

Mr. OWEN. The reserve bank is not in the Senator's State.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator does not allow me to finish my question. How could that bank, which could not lend its money at more than 6 per cent, afford to borrow money from the Federal reserve bank and pay 6 per cent for it?

Mr. OWEN. It can not afford to do it. It is a way to stop credit. It is a means of depressing and deflating credit in North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. Exactly. In a State where the rate is limited to 6 or 7 per cent, if the Federal reserve bank rate is fixed at 6 or 7 per cent, then the member banks in that State would practically be precluded from borrowing money from the Federal reserve banks.

Mr. OWEN. To be sure.

Mr. SIMMONS. The banks in that State, as in other States similarly situated, have already borrowed large sums of money from the Federal reserve banks, and the loans are falling due every month. They can not afford to renew the loans, if they have to pay a rate of interest so high, without taking their capital for doing business and paying the cash.

Mr. OWEN. Yes; and, of course, it involves a loss.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will pardon me, I have just paid a visit to my home city in North Carolina, and I have discovered that the banks in that section are in great distress because of the fact that they are confronted by usury laws fixing the rate at 6 per cent and the fact that they are being called to pay their loans. That makes it necessary for them to call the loans that they have been making——

Mr. OWEN. Yes; to be sure.

Mr. SIMMONS. Especially large loans that they have been making to agricultural supply men in my State, and I assume that is true pretty generally throughout the Union. There are farm furnishing houses located all about in the agricultural districts. They borrow large sums of money from the banks. They buy their produce and sell it to the farmers on time, to be paid for in the fall after the crop is harvested. I am told that the situation caused by this high rate of interest, against which the Senator is inveighing, has become so acute that the banks——

Mr. OWEN. It will be worse, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. SIMMONS. It has become so acute that the banks are compelled to call upon these supply houses to pay their loans at a season of the year when it is impossible for them to realize upon the securities which they have taken for goods they have sold. That is making a very serious situation, as I happen to know.

Mr. OWEN. It will help to cause an industrial depression. That is what will happen. If that is desirable and Senators wish to see that come about, they may treat the matter with negligence.

Mr. SIMMONS. But worse than that, if the Senator will pardon me, in some sections of the country it will paralyze the efforts of the farmer to produce his crops.

Mr. OWEN. I think it will.

Mr. SIMMONS. Because their supplies will be unavailable for the men with whom they have made their contracts, they will not be able to get the money to buy goods with which to carry on their farming operations.

Mr. OWEN. It will have the effect of causing industrial depression. It will have the effect of breaking the prices of products which now have a high value on the markets, making men hesitate to produce and tending to paralyze business. Some men think this desirable. I do not think so.

But the deflation of unwise credits ought to be directed by a discriminating judgment to the particular credits that ought to be deflated. There is a great volume of credit which you can not deflate. You can not deflate the $26,000,000,000 of bonds which have been issued by the United States for war purposes. Their market value is being deflated, of course, and the War Finance Corporation under the Treasury Department has been buying up these bonds at a depreciated value. They are selling down to about 15 per cent below par. You can break down the present market value of Government credits by establishing an artificial high rate of interest. You can break down the means of credit for the railroads of the country that require help to finance themselves if you raise an artificially high rate. You can make it more difficult for them, of course, but they will pass it on to the people in freight rates, and so forth.

The banks can take advantage of the urgency of the present demand and raise the rates, if they like, and make more money. But the policy of London, the policy of the Bank of England, is a wise policy. It is a stable, reasonably low rate of interest, so that commerce shall prosper, because when commerce prospers the banks prosper and the country prospers, and when commerce is broken down the banks will have unexpected trouble from some of their most valued customers.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will pardon me, it seems to me the purpose which the Federal Reserve Board has could be accomplished in another way that would not work any material harm, by the inauguration of a policy of refusing to loan to a member bank unless satisfactory assurances were given that that member bank would not loan for speculative purposes or for any purpose that was not reasonably effective.

Mr. OWEN. If the Senator will pardon me, that is precisely what I suggested to the Federal Reserve Board, that as far as individual loans were concerned, made for merely speculative purposes, they could be reduced by causing gradual liquidation; second, by refusing to extend new loans for speculative purposes, whether speculations in stock or speculations in real estate or in commodities for hoarding. That policy could be carried out by the member banks of the Federal Reserve System if the reserve banks and the Reserve Board insist upon that policy being pursued. That policy would be harmless, but when the Federal Reserve Board adopts the false policy on the New York Exchange and raises its rates to a higher figure to check speculation and talks about deflating credits without discriminating as to what particular credit is to be deflated, the most mischievous consequences may ensue. In Detroit and in Pittsburgh and in New York now men are talking about industrial depression.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. May I ask the Senator a question? We passed through both branches of Congress an amendment to the present law authorizing the board in their discretion to graduate and progress the rate of interest from a borrowing bank when it shall have passed what they determine to be normal. Is not that along the very line that the Senator is complaining of, that they are raising the rates of interest in order to bring about a deflation which already is reacting throughout the country to the detriment of business in general?

Mr. OWEN. The purpose of the act referred to by the Senator was that where banks were unduly aggressive and were asking more accommodation of the Federal reserve bank than their fair proportion, thereby cutting off other banks from an equitable participation in the lending powers of the reserve bank, they might make this discrimination by automatically raising the rates progressively on the aggressor. I think that a wise and just policy.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I anticipated the danger there which has now become a fact. In order that they might accomplish this, it seemed to them that it was necessary to put this general law into effect, that all banks, when they have gotten above a certain per cent of their capital and surplus, should be subject to this progressive and increased rate of interest. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] and, I take it, the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] have suggested that they should have used their discrimination and restricted the loans in those particular cases where it was pernicious or might not be indicated to be for the best interests of the country, but they have applied that rule throughout the entire country when there are banks which should have been encouraged to borrow more than any fixed per cent of their capital and surplus, especially in the agricultural sections, where the bread-and-meat question will be the paramount question for the next two or three years.

Mr. OWEN. My attention is called to "Big profits made by reserve banks," an article in to-day's Evening Star:

SOME BANKERS URGE INTEREST ON THEIR RESERVE.

According to Gov. Harding, of the Federal Reserve Board, the 12 original banks of the system will make about a hundred million dollars gross profits during the fiscal year ending with June 30, an excess of some $10,000,000 over the net of the previous fiscal period.

These reserve banks were not intended as money-making banks. I have no objection to their making money. I am quite in favor of their making enough to have a substantial reserve; and Congress turned over to them practically 100 per cent as reserve, and in that way showed the good will of Congress to these banks and a desire to strengthen them. I desire them to be strong; but what I am calling attention to is that the administration of the reserve act in such a way as to raise the rate in a sweeping fashion over good and bad alike, over the productive and the unproductive alike, making no discrimination with regard to it, results harmfully by exciting the country into the belief that we are going to the "demnition bow-wows" when we are in no danger whatever of doing anything of the kind if we pursue a sound policy.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. As I understand the argument of the Senator from Oklahoma, this high rate of interest was introduced in the hope of stopping speculation in stocks.

Mr. OWEN. I understand that it was.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. But it seems to have gone further now, and is affecting the commercial and the industrial interests of the country. There ought to be some stop put to it. It has gone too far. They scattered their shot too much. They shot at one class of people and are hitting another class.

Mr. OWEN. They are setting out a fire which they may not be able easily to stop. My purpose is to put some water on it right now.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I think that is right.

Mr. OWEN. I am glad the Senator from Maryland thinks I am right about it. I think other Senators should have an interest in it.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I think the purpose was not what is being done now. It was for the purpose of stopping speculation in stocks, which is all right, but now it is going too far. It is interfering with the progress of our country, with the industrial interests and commercial interests, and they are making the rates on money so high that those needing money for these purposes can not afford to borrow.

Mr. OWEN. I think that is right.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. If the Senator from Oklahoma will permit me, the suggestion of the Senator in regard to reaching speculations in stocks is right. They advance the rate of interest to stop that, when it is notoriously true that the stock speculator will meet any advance in interest in his speculation in stocks, while the men who are doing a legitimate business can not afford to do it.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. Yes; they can not afford to do it.

Mr. OWEN. That is quite right.

I do not wish to take up any more of the time of the Senate. I have written a letter in response to the letter which was printed in the RECORD, the substance of which I have stated on the floor. I ask, without reading, that it may be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter is as follows:

UNITED STATES SENATE,
May 14, 1920.

Hon. W. P. G. HARDING,
Governor Federal Reserve Board, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR GOVERNOR: I thank you for your letter of May 3, answering my letter of April 27, in which I urged the Federal Reserve Board to lower the interest rates of the reserve banks as a means of helping to restore Liberty bonds to par.

The Secretary of the Treasury and every agency of the Government, including the reserve banks and the member banks, cooperated in a strenuous drive to induce the American people to buy Liberty bonds. The people were told to buy the bonds until it hurt. They sold their property, they borrowed money, they mortgaged their homes to buy these bonds on the assurance of the Secretary of the Treasury that there was no better security, and they had a right to believe that these bonds would be maintained at par. But, my dear Governor, if you permit these high rates of interest, of which I have justly complained, the inevitable consequence will be that these Government bonds must go still lower than they are now instead of reacting to par.

The violent fluctuating high interest rates on the New York Stock Exchange which go from 8 to 30 per cent, advertised throughout the country in every important paper in the land, together with the high interest rates of the Federal reserve banks to member banks at 6 and 7 per cent, and the consequent higher commercial rates daily advertised in the public press of 8, 9, and 10 per cent, not to mention commissions on the side and discounts, are jointly impairing confidence and creating an atmosphere of suspicion, distrust, and widespread talk of pending industrial depression and industrial panic.

I have insisted that the powers of the Government should be exercised through the office of the Federal Reserve Board, the Federal reserve banks, and the Comptroller of the Currency to remove these causes, which, if persisted in, may cause a serious industrial depression and make Liberty bonds go still lower.

The claim of the New York Stock Exchange that these high and violently fluctuating interest rates on call loans are necessary for the purpose of preventing speculation is indefensible, because they do not prevent speculation. The professional operator immediately speculates in a bear market, which inevitably must follow these artificial high interest rates. The speculator can afford to pay high interest rates, but legitimate business can not. Moreover, the employment of bank credits for speculation can be prevented by harmless methods: First, by the banks refusing new loans for speculative purposes; second, by requiring gradual liquidation of old loans employed in speculation; and, third, by raising the margin on speculative loans.

The remedies I suggest are harmless to the general public. The remedy employed of high interest rates on call loans running up to 30 per cent is destructive of public confidence and threatens industrial depression.

When the Reserve Board raises the rate to 6 and 7 per cent it has the effect not of stopping the speculator but of stopping legitimate business, and putting the brakes on manufacture, commerce, agriculture, on production and distribution.

You quite misunderstand the point when you speak of my contention that the Liberty bond market recently fell because the Federal Reserve Board raised the rate of interest, which you think is disproved by the fact that the bonds fell in April, 1919, to 95 before the Federal Reserve Board raised the rate of interest. My contention is that the high rates of interest on the stock exchange, and the high rates charged by member banks on commercial loans based in part on the high rates of the reserve banks, are all factors producing this result, and when the Reserve Board recently raised the rate these bonds went down much lower than they had been before, and they must go lower still if the board persist in this policy. What I contend is that the Federal Reserve Board in raising these rates, and thus adopting the unwise policy of the stock exchange, is depreciating the market value of all securities, including Government bonds.

I understand the Reserve Board desires to deflate credit by raising the rates of interest. Assuredly raising the rates of interest will deflate credits, even the credits of the United States, of which I complain, but I am anxious the Reserve Board shall only deflate those credits that require deflation and not deflate credits of the Government and of legitimate productive business, which ought not to be deflated.

The United States was compelled to expand its credits, and issued $26,000,000,000 of war bonds. The war resulted in an increase of $20,000,000,000 of bank deposits, a total increase of expanded credits of $46,000,000,000. No substantial part of these credits should be deflated at this time. The only deflation of credit justified is the deflation of credits employed in speculative loans on investment securities, on real estate, and on commodities for hoarding by profiteers.

My dear governor, it seems to me that there is some serious misconception existing in the country with regard to what is inflation and what is not inflation. I am certainly opposed to inflation, but I am strongly in favor of the extension of business, increasing production and improving distribution, by extending credits on a stable low-interest rate.

The expansion of credit for such purposes is justified, but, of course, the expansion of credit beyond the available resources, even for the most important of purposes, is not justified. The Bank of England, conducted by the wisest merchants in the world, has not hesitated to extend credits for productive purposes even when the gold reserve was thereby seriously diminished. As you very well know, they went to a very low gold reserve during the war without ever denying credits to their business men who were engaged in legitimate industry. The London merchants had 3½ per cent acceptance rates all during the war, when the British Government paid 5 per cent.

If the people are frightened by the talk of industrial depression, by high interest rates, it has the effect of preventing production and putting the brakes on manufacture and on our entire industrial life.

I do not agree with Secretary Leffingwell that the present depression in Liberty bonds is due to the owners of Liberty bonds spending the bonds recklessly as spendthrifts. People who bought Liberty bonds do not deserve such a classification, although, of course, some individuals out of a very great number are spendthrifts. But the spendthrift quickly parts with his bonds to other people. The spendthrift theory does not explain the terrible depreciation.

If money was cheap and credits were available at low rates, it is perfectly obvious that these bonds would go to par, and just in degree that the banks of the country raise the rates to very high artificial figures to that degree the Liberty bonds and Victory bonds will assuredly fall in market value.

You advise me that the Liberty bonds "can not be brought back to par by artificial methods." They can be depressed by universal high rates of interest artificially fixed by the banks, and that is precisely what has happened and to which I earnestly object.

I do not say that the Federal reserve banks can restore these bonds to par by lending a part of their resources on these bonds at a low figure. What I do say is that the value of these bonds is depressed by the action of the Government in countenancing the scandalous interest rates on the New York Stock Exchange, the unreasonable interest rates by the member banks of the country, and the unfair interest rates by the reserve banks to the member banks.

You very justly say, my dear governor:

"There is a world-wide demand for capital, and the demand for bank credit in this country in agricultural, commercial, and industrial purposes is heavier than has ever been known before; investment demands for new construction, for the maintenance and equipment of railroads, and for the financing of our foreign trade are very great."

Are these just demands to be met by denying the credits, or are they to be repressed by raising the rates to prohibitive points, and thus retard enterprise and production, the employment of labor and capital in creating commodities?

You say the reserve banks would have been "overwhelmed with applications for loans" on Government securities if the reserve banks had continued to offer a low discount rate on paper secured by Government obligation.

I am not advocating the reserve banks lending beyond their resources at any rates or on any securities. I am protesting against the reserve banks setting a bad example to the country by raising the rates of interest on legitimate business engaged in production and distribution. I am objecting, my dear governor, to the Reserve Board taking advantage of this condition and raising these rates merely because the demand is urgent, when the proper function of the Federal reserve bank is to stabilize the interest rate, keep it at a reasonably low figure, and set a wise and just example to the member banks.

The member banks pay from 2 to 4 per cent for deposits and normally let their money out at from 5 to 7 per cent, with a margin of about 3 per cent. The reserve banks pay no interest on deposits, and 3 per cent is a rate high enough to enable them to make all the money they are entitled to make out of the public. On a 4 per cent rate the Federal Reserve Bank of New York last year made 110 per cent, and I suppose on a 6 and 7 per cent rate they will make this year about 160 per cent. This is precisely what I am objecting to. The Federal reserve banks should not be put in the attitude of profiteering or of setting the example of profiteering to member banks. The powers of the Government are not being properly exerted to stop the scandalous rates of interest on the New York Stock Exchange.

I was advised that six months ago the New York banks had nineteen hundred million dollars loaned on investment securities and the commerce of the country was suffering for credit. I believe, with the board, that these credits on investment securities and speculative loans should be diverted, as far as practicable, to productive purposes, but to raise the rates to 6 and 7 per cent upon all banks alike does not accomplish this end. It merely penalizes all business of every kind and character, regardless of whether they are using their credits for speculative or productive purposes.

What I earnestly desire to call to the attention of the board is that credits ought to be extended at a low rate to the extent of the capacity of the reserve banks for productive purposes; that member banks should be urged to do the same thing, and that the powers of the Government should be exerted against the excessive, violently fluctuating rates on the New York Stock Exchange.

Hoping that the suggestions which I have the honor to make may be of some service to the deliberations of the board and to the country, I remain,

Very respectfully, yours, ROBT. L. OWEN.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10378) to provide for the promotion and maintenance of the American merchant marine, to repeal certain emergency legislation, and to provide for the disposition, regulation, and use of property acquired thereunder, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment inserting section 33.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 50, after line 13, to insert:

SEC. 34. That paragraph (a) of section 11 of the act entitled "An act to remove certain burdens on the American merchant marine and encourage the American foreign carrying trade, and for other purposes," approved June 26, 1884, as amended, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 10. (a) That it shall be, and is hereby, made unlawful in any case to pay any seaman wages in advance of the time when he has actually earned the same, or to pay such advance wages, or to make any order, or note, or other evidence of indebtedness therefor to any other person, or to pay any person, for the shipment of seamen when payment is deducted or to be deducted from a seaman's wages. Any person violating any of the foregoing provisions of this section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction shall be punished by a fine of not less than $25 nor more than $100, and may also be imprisoned for a period of not exceeding six months, at the discretion of the court. The payment of such advance wages or allotment, whether made within or without the United States or territory subject to the jurisdiction thereof, shall in no case except as herein provided absolve the vessel or the master or the owner thereof from the full payment of wages after the same shall have been actually earned, and shall be no defense to a libel suit or action for the recovery of such wages. If any person shall demand or receive, either directly or indirectly, from any seaman or other person seeking employment, as seaman, or from any person on his behalf, any remuneration whatever for providing him with employment, he shall for every such offense be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and shall be imprisoned not more than six months or fined not more than $500."

Mr. KING. I should like to ask the Senator having this bill in charge what is the necessity now of reenacting legislation dealing with this subject?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I will call the Senator's attention to the only change made in the law by this provision. He will note on page 51, in lines 5 and 6, the words:

The payment of such advance wages or allotment—

Here is the change in existing law:

Whether made within or without the United States, or territory subject to the jurisdiction thereof.

The Supreme Court has upheld this section and has also upheld the right of Congress to deal with foreign seamen in our ports. The purpose of the provision is to prevent what is called "crimping" in the securing of seamen. For instance, we prevent by our law advances being made to seamen and sailors in this country. That was simply to prevent the boarding houses or the crimping houses from taking advantage of seamen, as the Senator understands. The purpose of this section is to prevent that as to sailors on ships coming from a foreign port to this country. It is a very common custom in many other countries to require advance payments on wages when seamen ship. Under this provision that practice will be stopped. That is the sole purpose of the proposed change.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, on page 51, after line 18, to insert:

SEC. 35. That the second proviso of the first paragraph of section 13 of the act entitled "An act to promote the welfare of American seamen in the merchant marine of the United States, to abolish arrest and imprisonment as a penalty for desertion and to secure the abrogation of treaty provisions in relation thereto, and to promote safety at sea," approved March 4, 1915, is amended to read as follows:

"Provided further, That upon examination under rules prescribed by the Department of Commerce as to eyesight, hearing, physical condition, and knowledge of the duties of seamanship, a citizen of the United States found competent may be rated as able seaman after having served on deck 12 months at sea or on the Great Lakes; but seamen examined and rated able seamen under this proviso shall not in any case compose more than one-fourth of the number of able seamen required by this section to be shipped or employed upon any vessel except that any American citizen rated as able seaman under this proviso, who has served one year at sea or on the Great Lakes after securing such rating, shall not be included as composing a part of the one-fourth of such able seamen under this proviso."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 52, after line 14, to insert:

SEC. 36. That section 20 of such act of March 4, 1915, be, and is, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 20. That any seaman who shall suffer personal injury in the course of his employment may, at his election, maintain an action for damages at law, with the right of trial by jury, and in such action all statutes of the United States modifying or extending the common-law right or remedy in cases of personal injury to railway employees shall apply; and in case of the death of any seaman as a result of any such personal injury the personal representative of such seaman may maintain an action for damages at law with the right of trial by jury, and in such action all statutes of the United States conferring or regulating the right of action for death in the case of railway employees shall be applicable."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 53, after line 4, to insert:

SEC. 37. That, in the judgment of Congress, articles or provisions in treaties or conventions to which the United States is a party, which restrict the right of the United States to impose discriminating customs duties on imports entering the United States in foreign vessels and in vessels of the United States, and which also restrict the right of the United States to impose discriminatory tonnage dues on foreign vessels and on vessels of the United States entering the United States, should be terminated; and the President is hereby authorized and directed within 90 days after this act becomes law to give notice to the several Governments, respectively, parties to such treaties or conventions that so much thereof as imposes any such restriction on the United States will terminate on the expiration of such periods as may be required for the giving of such notice by the provisions of such treaties or conventions.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I ask that that section may go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, section 37 will be passed over.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, on page 53, line 21, to change the number of the section from "12" to "38," and, in line 24, after the word "Corporation," to strike out "or other agencies created pursuant to authority of law," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 38. That the power and authority vested in the board by this act, except as herein otherwise provided, may be exercised directly by the board, or by it through the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I offer an amendment, in line 22, after the word "otherwise," to insert the word "exclusively."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator from Washington, under the provisions of this bill, what becomes of the Emergency Fleet Corporation? Is a consolidation effected between that and the Shipping Board?

Mr. JONES of Washington. No; the Emergency Fleet Corporation remains just as it is. It is really the agency of the Shipping Board now, and is continued, so far as may be necessary, in carrying out the provisions of this proposed act.

Mr. KING. Is it to be the instrumentality by which will be effectuated all of the duties and responsibilities which are devolved upon the Shipping Board?

Mr. JONES of Washington. No; not at all. It is really the instrumentality of the Shipping Board to handle and dispose of the ships, and so on; but it does not take care of the matter of discrimination or of regulating rates or revising the navigation laws or matters of policy, and so forth. It has nothing to do with such questions as those; but is the agency of the Shipping Board for the purpose of constructing ships, as it has been heretofore, and the agency to carry on dealings with reference to ships and the property of the Shipping Board.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the reason I have propounded the inquiry is that a number of suggestions have been made to me by persons who are more or less familiar with the duties of the Shipping Board and of the Emergency Fleet Corporation to the effect that the duties of both organizations could with propriety be performed by one; that the present arrangement led to more or less of duplication, to the setting up of unnecessary machinery, and they suggested a consolidation under which the Shipping Board should be fully authorized not only to perform the duties now devolved upon it by law, and such as may be devolved upon it under this bill, but as well whatever duties are devolved upon the Emergency Fleet Corporation. I ask the Senator from Washington why, in the formulation of this bill, that suggestion has not been carried into effect?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah knows that in dealing with property and making contracts and matters of similar character a legislative organization such as the Shipping Board has very little flexibility. There is no provision for suing it or that it shall bring suit or anything of that sort, so that in certain aspects the work can be much better done by a corporation. Independently of that, the two organizations are substantially the same, but the Emergency Fleet Corporation was created for the purpose of providing that flexibility, so that individuals could deal with it far better than they could with a purely legislative agency, such as the Shipping Board, which would have to have its powers more particularly defined so far as concerns its dealings with different subjects.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I have listened to the observations made by the chairman of the Committee on Commerce——

Mr. JONES of Washington. If the Senator will permit me, I will add merely a word. The original shipping act, as the Senator will remember, was passed before we entered the war, and for the purpose of enabling us to build ships for which some $50,000,000 were appropriated. Under that act it was provided that the Shipping Board, if it found it necessary to carry out the purposes of the act, could create one or more corporations to do the things necessary to be done. Under that authority it created the Emergency Fleet Corporation. That was the only corporation that was created. That corporation is, as I have said, practically the same as the Shipping Board; that is, the five members of the Shipping Board are trustees of the Emergency Fleet Corporation. I think there are two additional members, but if this bill passes as now framed the members of the Shipping Board will constitute the trustees of the corporation.

The original act also provided that the Shipping Board might create additional corporations or agencies. We have stricken out that authorization, because we thought they ought not to create any additional corporations; that the one now in existence was enough, and we did not think it was wise to disturb the whole organization; but for the reason which I stated a while ago, that a person can deal much more flexibly with a corporation in matters of contract and with reference to obligations than he can with a legislative agency such as the Shipping Board, we did not make any change in the status of the Emergency Fleet Corporation.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the Senator will remember that during the war there was some complaint that the Shipping Board and the Emergency Fleet Corporation did not cooperate and integrate as they should have done; that there was too much machinery; that the organizations were too widely separated; and that they did not properly function. As to whether or not those criticisms were warranted, I am not prepared to state, but I do believe there was too much machinery, either in the Shipping Board or in the Emergency Fleet Corporation, or in both, and that there is too much machinery now in either one or both of those organizations.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I will say to the Senator—and I think I know what I am talking about with reference to this phase of the matter, at any rate—that the real difficulty during the early part of the war was that the Shipping Board and the manager, I might say, or the chairman of the Emergency Fleet Corporation, did not work very well together, because the manager of the corporation did not have the authority that the manager of a corporation usually has, and he was hampered, restricted, and limited by the Shipping Board.

Finally, however, the by-laws of the corporation were so amended as to vest the powers of the Emergency Fleet Corporation practically in the manager, who was the chairman, and that enabled the Emergency Fleet Corporation then to go ahead and do the business that it was really intended to do. That was really the difficulty originally.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Is it not a fact that the Shipping Board created the Emergency Fleet Corporation?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Oh, yes; the Emergency Fleet Corporation is an agency of that organization.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. And in this bill it is provided that they shall do the same thing, is it not?

Mr. JONES of Washington. We do not provide that; we simply leave that as it is now.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. It is left as the law was originally written.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. So that the coordination depends upon the discretion with which the board selects those who are to function for it?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Oh, yes.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, at the top of page 54, to insert:

SEC. 39. That if any provision of this act is declared unconstitutional or the application of any provision to certain circumstances be held invalid, the remainder of the act and the application of such provisions to circumstances other than those as to which it is held invalid shall not be affected thereby.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 54, after line 6, to insert:

SEC. 40. That when used in this act, unless the context otherwise requires, the terms "person," "vessel," "documented under the laws of the United States," and "citizen of the United States" shall have the meaning assigned to them by sections 1 and 2 of the "shipping act, 1916," as amended by this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 54, after line 12, to insert:

SEC. 41. That section 2 of the "shipping act, 1916," is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 2. That within the meaning of this act no corporation, partnership, or association shall be deemed a citizen of the United States unless all the stock and securities of such corporation, partnership, or association are at all times wholly and bona fide owned by citizens of the United States, and, in the case of a corporation, unless in addition to such requirement, its president and directors are citizens of the United States, and the corporation itself is organized under the laws of the United States, or of a State, Territory, District, or possession thereof.

"A corporation shall not be deemed to be so owned by citizens of the United States (a) if the title to all of its stock and other securities is not vested in such citizens, free from any trust or fiduciary obligation in favor of any person not a citizen of the United States; or (b) if all the voting power in such corporation is not vested in citizens of the United States; or (c) if, through any contract or understanding, it is so arranged that voting power in such corporation may be exercised, directly or indirectly, in behalf of any person who is not a citizen of the United States; or (d) if by any other means whatsoever control of any interest in the corporation is conferred upon or permitted to be exercised by any person who is not a citizen of the United States: Provided, That for the purpose of operating vessels exclusively in foreign commerce a corporation, partnership, or association organized and officered as provided in this section shall be deemed a citizen of the United States if at least 75 per cent of its stock and other securities are at all times bona fide owned by citizens of the United States, free from any trust or fiduciary obligation in favor of any person not a citizen of the United States."

Mr. EDGE obtained the floor.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. CALDER. I wish to offer an amendment to this section.

Mr. EDGE. Perhaps the amendment is the same. I was going to offer an amendment, on page 54, line 17, after the word "unless," to insert the words "at least 90 per cent of," which will make the three or four lines beginning on line 15 read:

That within the meaning of this act no corporation, partnership, or association shall be deemed a citizen of the United States unless at least 90 per cent of all the stock and securities of such corporation—

And so forth.

I think it is very indefensible to pass any act providing something that we know perfectly well is impossible of enforcement. When we require 100 per cent of the stock of a shipping corporation to be owned at all times by American citizens, we know perfectly well that we are making innocent violators out of every corporation in the country, or at least we are certainly inviting it. If one share of stock is sold on the exchange—and, of course, in the case of many of these corporations the stock is listed—the result of it would be that you could proceed under this act for violation, and if stock was owned by an American woman who married an alien the same thing would occur.

I feel that if we make the provision 90 per cent we are in every way protecting American interests and we are not passing laws that we know perfectly well are unenforceable.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from New Jersey if it would not be more difficult to keep within the 10 per cent than to know that you could not sell any of the stock to persons other than citizens of the United States?

Mr. EDGE. In answer to that question there is unquestionably difficulty in keeping a record of it in any event; but we established a precedent at the present session of Congress in passing the so-called export finance bill, which was discussed on the floor of the Senate by a number of Senators and which presented exactly the same question. We finally decided in the case of that bill that a majority of the stock should be held by American citizens, and also that all the directors and officers should be American citizens. I believe that all the directors and all the officers should be American citizens, but I do not entirely agree with the Senator from South Carolina in his view that it would be as difficult to enforce a 90 per cent restriction as it would to enforce a 100 per cent restriction. If it is a known fact that there is a small leeway, like 10 per cent, I think the average corporation would make every effort to defend that situation. The stock records, of course, are open, and there is a way to do it; but I do not like to ask for 100 per cent when it seems unnecessary as a protection to American interests and is such an invitation for continued violation.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. EDGE. I yield.

Mr. KING. I invite the Senator's attention to the words on page 55, with a view to inquiring whether they will not call for a modification of his statement.

Mr. EDGE. I am going to offer an amendment to subdivision (a) that would call for the same modification, as I understand.

Mr. KING. If the Senator will pardon me a moment, in line 13 there is a provision reading as follows:

Provided, That for the purpose of operating vessels exclusively in foreign commerce a corporation, partnership, or association organized and officered as provided in this section shall be deemed a citizen of the United States if at least 75 per cent of its stock and other securities are at all times—

And so forth.

The Senator's complaint was that it limited the ownership to Americans exclusively. As I interpret this, it provides that foreign residents may own at least 25 per cent of the stock of vessels engaged in foreign commerce.

Mr. EDGE. I think that is correct. That, however, is a different classification.

Mr. KING. Then the Senator's criticism would apply only to vessels that are engaged in domestic commerce, coastwise trade?

Mr. EDGE. The answer to the Senator from Utah would seem to me to be this: It is true that the mere fact that in the case of corporations engaged in foreign commerce the bill only exacts 75 per cent—that is, that the stockholders shall total not less than 75 per cent of American citizens—demonstrates that vessels owned by corporations that are organized under American laws, and are doing business abroad, are only required to have 75 per cent American citizenship-owned stock; but vessels doing a coastwise or American business solely are, under the terms of the same section, required to have 100 per cent. I do not see the reason for the difference in the requirement. I think both of them could be well 75 per cent. I am simply making as modest a modification as possible in order to meet the conditions that exist.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, just a word.

I recognize the difficulty of enforcing the law. I think there would be just as much difficulty, however, in enforcing the law as proposed to be amended by the Senator from New Jersey as there would be in enforcing it as it is proposed in the bill.

I want to read just a couple of extracts from a letter from the chairman of the Shipping Board, urging this amendment:

Believing that it is essential that our coasting fleet be wholly owned by American citizens, I respectfully suggest that section 29 of the second committee print be amended—

So as to make it read as we have it in the bill. He says, further:

Unless our coasting fleet be wholly and unequivocally owned by loyal United States citizens, it can not be rated a dependable unit in time of national emergency. Such dependability must always be insured, and this can only be accomplished by making 100 per cent bona fide American ownership the only key to our coasting trade, and in so far as consistent with present conditions, to establish the same requirement for our foreign commerce.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Certainly.

Mr. KING. Suppose a case where a foreigner is an heir to an American who owns a certain block of stock in a coastwise boat, and under the laws of distribution that alien received the stock. What becomes of the stock? Is it forfeited? What provisions are there in the bill to penalize the corporation, if it is to be penalized, for permitting some alien to remain the owner of stock in the corporation?

Mr. JONES of Washington. There are no penalizing provisions. There are no penalizing provisions in the law now and as it has existed ever since we had a Shipping Board. We have made no change in that particular.

Mr. KING. How would the provision be enforced, if there is any enforcement of the provision, restricting the ownership to all Americans?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I will say that I do not know just how it would be done. I think probably the Shipping Board would make some rules and regulations under which they would seek to control the issuance of stock to aliens, or something of that kind; but there is no penalty.

Mr. KING. It is just a sort of a naked fulmination?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Really, that is about it.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Washington what is the present provision?

Mr. JONES of Washington. The present provision is a controlling interest, and there is no provision about enforcing compliance. This follows the present law.

Mr. EDGE. The controlling interest—which, of course, means the majority of the stock, which has been apparently the policy heretofore—is changed here to a 100 per cent basis. I have never believed in passing a law that we admitted while it was before the Senate could not possibly be enforced.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] to the amendment of the committee.

On a division, the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 55, at the end of line 20, it is proposed to insert a semicolon and the following:

And provided further, That a person who resides in the United States, and who has lost the status of a citizen of the United States through marriage, shall be deemed a citizen of the United States for the purpose of determining the citizenship of a corporation, partnership, or association under the provisions of this section.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I see no objection to that amendment, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from New York to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. SMITH of South of Carolina. I ask to have the amendment stated again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will restate the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was restated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from New York to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I should like the attention of the chairman of the committee for a moment. I think there is nothing more difficult to preserve intact than the ownership or the control of a corporation that issues stock. The bill tries to do that, but the section only covers the question of ownership. It provides:

That within the meaning of this act no corporation, partnership, or association shall be deemed a citizen of the United States unless all the stock and securities of such corporation, partnership, or association are at all times wholly and bona fide owned by citizens of the United States.

Under that section the stock might all be owned by citizens of the United States, and all of it might be trusteed or assigned to an alien, or to an alien corporation. Indeed, the modern method of transacting the business of corporations frequently results in exactly the thing I have suggested being done.

I therefore suggest to the chairman this amendment: In line 19, after the word "by," insert "and under the control of," so that the clause would read:

Unless all the stock and securities of such corporation, partnership, or association are at all times wholly and bona fide owned by and under the control of citizens of the United States.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I have no objection to that, although I am rather inclined to think that it is covered on the other page. Notice on page 55, line 1:

A corporation shall not be deemed to be so owned by citizens of the United States (a) if the title to all of its stock and other securities is not vested in such citizens, free from any trust or fiduciary obligation in favor of any person not a citizen of the United States; or (b) if all the voting power in such corporation is not vested in citizens of the United States; or (c) if, through any contract or understanding, it is so arranged that voting power—

And so forth.

If that does not cover what the Senator wishes to accomplish, I am perfectly willing to have it amended.

Mr. REED. I had not noticed the section. I am working on the bill piecemeal.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I understand.

Mr. REED. Nevertheless, I think it would do no harm to put the words in which I suggest.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think not.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, if it is not elsewhere covered in the bill, I desire to suggest this amendment, at the bottom of page 54, at the end of line 24:

No issue, sale, hypothecation, or transfer of stock or ownership shall be valid unless recorded with and approved by the Shipping Board.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I have no objection to that amendment. I am inclined to think, however, that these corporations, in the transfer of their stock, and so on, would be controlled by the authority under which they are organized. I suppose every State has laws of incorporation, and all these corporations would be organized under the laws of some State. They would control the transfer and disposition of stock. But personally I have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. REED. If that rule is to be applied, it might also affect other clauses of the bill. I have no desire to make it hard for these corporations to do business, but I know of no way in the world by which the Shipping Board can determine whether a corporation's stock is really owned by American citizens except that the record of the transfer of the stock should be filed with it, and subject to its approval. If the words I have suggested go in, I think we will have come very near fixing it so that these companies will have to remain American companies.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, it seems to me that the amendment is a little too broad. I do not think the board ought to have the authority to prevent a transfer of stock by any American citizen to any other American citizen, or corporation, or association, or partnership, and it appears to me that the Senator's amendment would confer discretionary power on the board, and make it necessary for them to approve of a transfer. I do not think any board ought to be permitted to determine whether or not "A," a bona fide citizen of the United States, may sell his stock in a corporation to some other citizen of the United States.

Mr. REED. I did not have the point in mind which the Senator has suggested. I have no desire to prevent the sale of stock by a citizen of the United States to another citizen, and if the Senator thinks it is too broad, I will offer the amendment in this form——

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. NELSON. Would not a provision in the bill prohibiting stock exchanges from selling the stock to any one but citizens of the United States be effective?

Mr. REED. That would cover the stock exchange transaction, but as soon as it got into the hands of the purchaser on the stock exchange he might sell it to some one else.

Mr. NELSON. Would it not be a good plan to prohibit the stock exchanges from selling this stock to anybody but citizens of the United States?

Mr. REED. I think the amendment in this form practically accomplishes it. I appreciate the suggestion made by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] and I will change the form of the amendment so that it shall read:

No issue, sale, hypothecation, or transfer of stock or ownership shall be valid unless recorded with the Shipping Board.

In other words, they must make a record with the Shipping Board.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I have no objection to the amendment to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment to the amendment as modified.

The READING CLERK. On page 54, at the end of line 24, insert:

No issue, sale, hypothecation, or transfer of stock or ownership shall be valid unless recorded with the Shipping Board.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, let me ask the Senator from Missouri a question. Has the Senator considered this situation, which I think might arise under his amendment?

The holders of stock can indorse their certificates in blank and hand them over to a foreigner or a foreign corporation to be held in their treasury. In that way really the foreigner controls the concern. Of course, he could not become the equitable owner of the stock until he had finally secured the action of the Shipping Board, but actually it would deprive the American management of real control, because it would only be voted when the foreigners were of a mind to surrender it. I am not prepared, on the spur of the moment, to suggest whether that is any real danger or not, but it ought to be effectively controlled if it is a danger. I leave it for the conference committee to consider in case the amendment is agreed to in its present form.

Mr. REED. I sought to cover that by the amendment which I have just offered.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I did not hear it read.

Mr. REED. My amendment was to insert in the clause "unless all the stock and securities of such corporation, partnership, or association are at all times wholly and bona fide owned by citizens of the United States," the words "and under the control of," so that it will read "wholly and bona fide owned by and under the control of citizens of the United States."

That may not be broad enough to cover it, but supplemented by this language on the next page in the text of the bill as offered, I think it would:

A corporation shall not be deemed to be so owned by citizens of the United States (a) if the title to all of its stock and other securities is not vested in such citizens, free from any trust or fiduciary obligation in favor of any person not a citizen of the United States.

Perhaps the two together cover it, although I will repeat to the Senator from Connecticut, who has come in since I made the remark, that the control of stock is one of the most difficult things in the world to handle.

Mr. EDGE. Let the amendment to the amendment be read as modified.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state it as modified.

The READING CLERK. On page 54, at the end of line 24, insert:

No issue, sale, hypothecation, or transfer of stock or ownership shall be valid unless recorded with the Shipping Board.

Mr. EDGE. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. EDGE. I am in sympathy with the object the Senator is attempting to attain, but by incorporating the word "valid" into a law would we not in effect raise the question of validity on the ordinary sale of stock? If a company should cease to qualify as being under 100 per cent American control, by using that language would we not really raise the question of the actual validity of the sale of stock?

Mr. REED. I intended to do that. I intended to make it so that one of these corporations which has the benefits of this law could not sell its stock to foreigners.

Mr. EDGE. I do not think the Senator understands my suggestion, if he will permit me. As I understand the section, the moment a company permits one share of stock to go out of the hands of an American owner, it automatically ceases to function under the bill.

Mr. REED. Oh, no.

Mr. EDGE. It ceases to be a company which can operate under the bill; that is certainly correct. Therefore, I make the point, why should we then in any way attempt to raise the question of the validity of the sale, when they automatically go out from under the act anyhow?

Mr. REED. Merely because we will not know whether their stock has gone into the hands of foreigners unless there is some place where they must register the transfer.

Mr. EDGE. I agree with the Senator on that.

Mr. REED. And the only way to compel them to register the transfer is to make a sale invalid until it is so registered. Then the owner of the stock, in order to have his stock of value, it seems to me, would necessarily take it to the board and register it.

Mr. EDGE. I am in entire agreement with the Senator that it should be registered with the Shipping Board. That is the only method. But the word "valid" seems to me to be rather a dangerous word to use.

Mr. KING. May I inquire of my friend from Missouri whether his amendment would in any way interfere with the usual custom of hypothecating stocks with banks for loans? As the Senator knows, one of the easiest methods employed by business men to obtain money is to go to a bank and give the note of the individual or the corporation and pledge the stock of a corporation as collateral security for the obligation. I fancy that the stocks of these corporations may be used for loans. Would the amendment offered by the Senator forbid the acceptation by the banks of an indorsed certificate as collateral for a loan to be made to the owner?

Mr. REED. I think it would compel a registration of the transaction with the Shipping Board. I believe we are forced to do that, even though it to some extent interferes with the freedom of movement of the stock, because the very thing we are trying to do is to keep this stock from getting into the hands of foreign holders. If you permit it to be hypothecated without a registration of it, it might speedily be hypothecated to some foreign shipping corporation, and in that way the control would pass from us. I know of no way to avoid that without interposing some sort of an obstacle, which we might like to avoid if we could do it, and still keep the corporation securely within the United States.

Mr. KING. I appreciate the point my distinguished friend is making, but it seems to me that it is going to interfere with the usual course of business and make it very difficult at times for individuals to obtain a loan speedily. It occurs to me that a provision might be attached to the bill, or the amendment of the Senator might be so modified as that where notice was given to the Shipping Board that stock had been pledged for a loan, that would accomplish the purpose.

I am in entire sympathy with the position the Senator takes, and his desire to restrict the sale of this stock to foreigners, and yet I believe that his amendment will interfere materially with business operations and prove quite embarrassing to those who own the stock and who will be compelled to utilize it in their business for the purpose of securing loans. However, I shall not object to the amendment offered by the Senator.

I ask the chairman of the committee a question, in view of the statement just made by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] and the acquiescence in that statement by the Senator, although the RECORD does not show his acquiescence. The Senator from New Jersey stated that under the provisions of the bill if one share of stock passed into the hands of an alien, no matter by what process that ownership was obtained, automatically the corporation would cease to be permitted to enjoy the benefits of the bill, even though that transfer were made against the wish of all the rest of the stockholders and of the board of directors of the corporation.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think the situation would be met by the amendment of the Senator from Missouri, because it is provided by that amendment that the sale, transfer, and so on, shall not be valid until it is recorded with the Shipping Board. So that would prevent a fraudulent passing of a share of stock. The language of the section is that—

A corporation shall not be deemed to be so owned by citizens of the United States (a) if the title to all of its stock and other securities is not vested in such citizens, free from any trust or fiduciary obligation—

And so forth.

Mr. KING. Let me make this inquiry of the Senator: Suppose stock, by devolution upon the death of the owner, passes to some alien as an heir. What occurs then? Does the corporation, pending the settlement of the estate, cease to have the benefits of this act? Is it to be outlawed and penalized?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think it would be under this act.

Mr. KING. It seems to me that that would be unfortunate. Suppose some citizen of the United States dies who owns a share of stock in a corporation, and his son, or daughter, or some other heir, is an alien——

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. McCORMICK. Let me ask the Senator if that problem can not be met very easily by amendment? The Senator knows that under the laws of some of the States certain kinds of property may not be owned by aliens, and that in the event of the death of an owner and inheritance by an alien a period is fixed by law within which the alien heir must dispose of the ownership of the inherited property.

Mr. KING. I am directing attention to the provision because in legislation heretofore enacted that question received attention, and, as I recall, there was some provision that the stock must be disposed of within a certain time. It does seem to me that it is too severe a penalty to visit upon a corporation to deny it the benefits of this act simply because some man dies and he happens to have a relative who is his heir residing in some other country.

Mr. EDGE. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. EDGE. I again draw attention to the fact that it was just to meet such a possible situation, where a corporation, the management, the officers, and directors would be absolutely helpless, that I suggested an amendment to reduce the necessary amount of stock to be owned by American citizens to 90 per cent. That is purely an arbitrary figure, but it is to admit of some little leeway so the law would not be continually violated even innocently.

The benefits of the act, I think, are such that if a corporation were engaged in coastwise trade and its vessels carrying freight and passengers to American ports, as provided under the coastwise laws and this act, would suddenly have their stock pass into the hands of an alien in some way or other, and if anyone desired to start proceedings, they would automatically have to give up their service under a strict interpretation of the act. I do not see any real gain in passing that type of legislation.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I will say to the Senator from Utah and the Senator from New Jersey that their suggestions will be given very careful consideration in conference. If the Senator from Utah can in the meantime frame some provision that will meet the situation, I shall be very glad to have it presented, and the vote can be reconsidered.

Mr. KING. With that understanding, I have no objection to the amendment being agreed to. I shall prepare an amendment during the interim and submit it to the Senator tomorrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is now on agreeing to the committee amendment, inserting section 41 as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. It has been suggested that an amendment be prepared to this section by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] covering the question we have just been discussing. If we agree to the amendment now a further amendment would be precluded.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I have just stated that if the Senator from Utah would prepare an amendment covering the provision he would like to have inserted, I would be glad to reconsider the amendment.

Mr. REED. Very well.

The next amendment was, on page 55, line 21, to change the number of the section from "13" to "42," and in line 22, after the word "act," to change the date "1919" to "1920," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 42. That this act may be cited as the merchant marine act, 1920.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I have one more amendment to present. It is to take care of the hiatus that was suggested by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] with reference to the board. I think it would be well to have that cared for.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proposed amendment will be stated.

The READING CLERK. Add a new section, as follows:

SEC. —. That the present members of the board shall continue as such until their successors, provided for in this act, shall be appointed and qualified.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That completes the amendments of the committee to the bill, except those that were passed over. I shall not ask the Senate to consider the bill further to-day.

RECESS.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Saturday, May 15, 1920, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, May 14, 1920.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou Great Creator and Dispenser of every good, our Father in heaven, help us to prove ourselves worthy recipients by conforming our lives to what we know to be right in the eternal fitness of things; confirmed by the still small voice and the revelation of the heart of Christ, by His teachings, incomparable character, and sublime death on Calvary; that we may hallow Thy name and grow day by day into the likeness of our Maker. In the spirit of the Master. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a request for unanimous consent.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. For what?

Mr. GARNER. That the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] may have 20 minutes in which to address the House.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Of course, I like to be accommodating, as the gentleman knows, but I would like to go ahead with the business of the House.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that immediately following the disposition of the conference report called up by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. KELLEY] that the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] be permitted to address the House for 20 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] asks unanimous consent that immediately following the calling up of the conference report the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] have leave to address the House for 20 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. SELLS. Reserving the right to object, this is pension day in the House, and there are two bills on the calendar which the Committee on Pensions and the Committee on Invalid Pensions expect to call up. Could it not be arranged that the gentleman's speech be deferred until after the consideration of those bills?

Mr. GARNER. There is no danger of the gentleman's bills not being passed.

Mr. SELLS. No; and I do not anticipate that there is any danger that the gentleman will not be permitted to speak.

Mr. GARNER. If we stayed here until we passed the pension bills everybody would go home, and nobody would hear the gentleman from South Carolina. Nobody is going to stay here and consider pension bills, because there is no opposition. So I thought you could defer that matter until the gentleman had made his speech, and then gentlemen could go home and you could pass your pension bills. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER].

Mr. SELLS. I withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection.

REREFERENCE OF BILL.

The SPEAKER. The bill S. 2977, an act to amend section 8 of an act to provide for the sale of desert lands in certain States and Territories, and so forth, is on the House Calendar, and the Chair, without objection, will refer it to the Union Calendar.

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. OSBORNE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the Fuller Civil War pension act, and I also wish to incorporate in my remarks the act itself and the instructions to the Pension Bureau.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California [Mr. OSBORNE] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the Fuller pension bill and incorporate in the remarks the bill itself. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HARRELD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD an editorial appearing in the New York Times of May 10 headed, "Save the Postal Service."

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not recognize the gentleman for that purpose.

EFFICIENCY OF PERSONNEL OF THE NAVY—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill H. R. 11927, and ask unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. KELLEY] calls up the conference report on the bill H. R. 11927, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 11927) to increase the efficiency of the personnel of the Navy and Coast Guard through the temporary provision of bonuses or increased compensation.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The statement was read.

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 11927) to increase the efficiency of the personnel of the Navy

"SEC. 11. That in lieu of compensation now prescribed by law, commissioned officers of the Coast and Geodetic Survey shall receive the same pay and allowances as now are or hereafter may be prescribed for officers of the Navy with whom they hold relative rank as prescribed in the act of May 22, 1917, entitled 'An act to temporarily increase the commissioned and warrant and enlisted strength of the Navy and Marine Corps, and for other purposes,' including longevity; and all laws relating to the retirement of commissioned officers of the Navy shall hereafter apply to commissioned officers of the Coast and Geodetic Survey: Provided, That hereafter longevity pay for officers in the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, Coast Guard, Public Health Service, and Coast and Geodetic Survey shall be based on the total of all service in any or all of said services.

"SEC 12. That hereafter when any commissioned officer, noncommissioned officer of the grade of color sergeant and above, including any noncommissioned officer of the Marine Corps of corresponding grade, warrant officer, chief petty officer, or petty officer (first class), having a wife or dependent child or children, is ordered to make a permanent change of station, the United States shall furnish transportation in kind from funds appropriated for the transportation of the Army, the Navy, the Marine Corps, the Coast Guard, the Coast and Geodetic Survey, and the Public Health Service to his new station for the wife and dependent child or children: Provided, That for persons in the naval service the term 'permanent station,' as used in this section, shall be interpreted to mean a shore station or the home yard of the vessel to which the person concerned may be ordered; and a duly authorized change in home yard or home port of such vessel shall be deemed a change of station: Provided further, That if the cost of such transportation exceeds that for transportation from the old to the new station the excess cost shall be paid to the United States by the officer concerned: Provided further, That transportation supplied the wife or dependent child or children of such officer, to or from stations beyond the continental limits of the United States, shall not be other than by Government transport, if such transportation is available: And provided further, That the personnel of the Navy shall have the benefit of all existing laws applying to the Army and the Marine Corps for the transportation of household effects.

"SEC. 13. That the provisions of sections 1, 3, 4, 5, and 6 of this act shall remain effective until the close of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, unless sooner amended or repealed: Provided, That the rates of pay prescribed in sections 4 and 6 hereof shall be the rates of pay during the current enlistment of all men in active service on the date of the approval of this act, and for those who enlist, reenlist, or extend their enlistments prior to July 1, 1922, for the term of such enlistment, reenlistment, or extended enlistment: Provided further, That the increases provided in this act shall not enter into the computation of the retired pay of officers or enlisted men who may be retired prior to July 1, 1922: And provided further, That a special committee, to be composed of five Members of the Senate, to be appointed by the Vice President, and five Members of the House of Representatives, to be appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives, shall make an investigation and report recommendations to their respective Houses not later than the first Monday in January, 1922, relative to the readjustment of the pay and allowances of the commissioned and enlisted personnel of the several services herein mentioned.

"SEC. 14. That nothing contained in this act shall operate to reduce the pay or allowances of any officer or enlisted man on the active or retired list: Provided, That the allowances and gratuities now authorized by existing law are not changed hereby, except as otherwise specified in this act.

"SEC. 15. That the appropriations 'Pay of the Navy, 1920,' and 'Pay, Marine Corps, 1920,' are hereby made available for any of the expenses authorized by this act, and any part or all of the appropriations 'Provisions, Navy, 1920,' and 'Maintenance, Quartermaster's Department, Marine Corps, 1920,' not required for the objects of expenditure specified in said appropriations, may be transferred to the appropriations 'Pay of the Navy, 1920,' or 'Pay, Marine Corps, 1920,' respectively, as may be required."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate to the title of the bill, and agree to the same.

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 11927) to increase the efficiency of the personnel of the Navy and Coast Guard through the temporary provision of bonuses or increased compensation submit the following statement explaining the effect of the action agreed upon by the conference committee and submitted in the accompanying conference report, namely:

The sections agreed upon in lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment retain practically verbatim all of the provisions of the bill H. R. 11927 as it originally passed the House, and in addition embody many of the features of the Senate amendment in more or less altered form. The bill as agreed upon places all of the military or quasi military services of the Government on a similar basis as regards rates of pay, and provides relief for all of them by way of temporary specific increases in compensation, retroactive to January 1, 1920, and effective until June 30, 1922, with a further provision for an investigation of the entire subject of the pay and allowances of the personnel of these services, looking toward a complete readjustment thereof within the period named.

Section 1 of the bill as agreed upon provides specific increases in the pay of commissioned officers of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, and Public Health Service in lieu of the various pay increases for officers proposed in the Senate amendment, as follows:

Army and Marine Corps.	Navy.	Public Health Service.	Increase as carried in bill.
Colonels	Captains	Assistant surgeons general.	$600
Lieutenant colonels	Commanders	Senior surgeons	600
Majors	Lieutenant commanders.	Surgeons	840
Captains	Lieutenants	Passed assistant surgeons.	720
First lieutenants	Lieutenants (j.g.) and acting assistant surgeons.	Assistant surgeons	600
Second lieutenants	Ensigns		420

A proviso places contract surgeons serving full time on a parity, in pay, with second lieutenants.

Section 2 is substantially the same as section 7 of the Senate amendment; and extends temporarily until June 30, 1922, the benefits prescribed under the act of April 16, 1918, granting commutation of quarters, heat, and light during the war emergency to officers in the field or at sea having dependents.

Section 3 is taken from section 1 of the original bill, H. R. 11927. It relates to the pay of warrant officers of the Navy, and provides for them a specific increase of $240 per annum.

Section 4 is based on the last clause of section 1 of the Senate amendment, and relates to the pay of enlisted men of the Army and Marine Corps and members of the female Nurse Corps of the Army and Navy. It provides an increase of 20 per cent in the pay of those receiving $33 per month or more.

Section 5 is taken from section 3 of the Senate amendment. It provides increased compensation, by way of an additional ration or commutation thereof, for the higher grade noncommissioned officers of the Army and Marine Corps, and has the effect of making their total pay fairly equivalent to that of petty officers of the Navy of similar grade. It also contains a provision allowing to Army field clerks and to field clerks Quartermaster Corps, whose total pay and allowances do not exceed $2,500 per year, a specific increase of $240 per annum.

Section 6 is the same as section 2 of the original bill, H. R. 11927, with minor changes in phraseology. It provides increased compensation and fixes the scales of pay as well for the enlisted men and petty officers of the Navy.

Section 7 is precisely the same as section 3 of the original bill, H. R. 11927, and relates to the pay of civilian professors and instructors at the United States Naval Academy.

Section 8 is the same as section 4 of the original bill, H. R. 11927, as modified in section 2 of the Senate amendment. It places the officers and men of the Coast Guard on a parity, so far as concerns pay and allowances, with officers and men of corresponding grades or ratings and length of service in the Navy.

Section 9 is substantially the same as section 5 of the original bill, H. R. 11927, and provides that no back pay shall be granted to any person who shall have left the service after December 31, 1919, and prior to approval of this act, unless recalled to active service or reenlisted.

Section 10 is substantially the same as section 6 of the original bill, H. R. 11927. It relates to the payment of an amount equal to four months' pay and extends the benefits of continuous service to discharged naval seamen who reenlist within one year after their discharge. The provision becomes inoperative six months after approval of the act.

Section 11 is substantially the same as section 5 of the Senate amendment. It provides that the commissioned officers of the Coast and Geodetic Survey, a highly technical and specialized service, shall receive the same pay and allowances as are prescribed for officers of the Navy, with whom they hold relative rank, as prescribed in the act of May 22, 1917. It also contains a proviso placing all the services on an equality in the matter of computation of longevity or service pay.

Section 12 is substantially the same as section 6 of the Senate amendment, with some modifications and added provisions. It permits transportation in kind to be furnished for the wife and dependent children of commissioned, noncommissioned, warrant, or petty officers when they are ordered to make a permanent change of station, and provides further that the personnel of the Navy shall have the benefit of existing laws applying to the Army and Marine Corps for the transportation of household effects.

Section 13 is based on section 7 of the original bill, H. R. 11927, with amendments. It provides that the increases in pay specified in the act shall be effective until June 30, 1922, but shall not enter into the computation of retired pay; and a further proviso relates to the appointment of a joint special committee to investigate and to report to Congress by January, 1922, the question of readjustments in the pay and allowances of the personnel of all the services.

Section 14 is substantially the same as section 9 of the original bill, H. R. 11927, and provides that nothing in the act shall operate to reduce the pay or allowances of any officer or enlisted man.

Section 15 is practically the same as section 8 of the original bill, H. R. 11927. It makes existing naval and Marine Corps appropriations available for the payment of any expenses authorized by the act during the current fiscal year.

On amendment of the Senate to the title of the bill: This amendment in title is agreed to, since it more aptly describes the scope of the legislation as amended and agreed to.

THOMAS S. BUTLER,
PATRICK H. KELLEY,
FRED A. BRITTEN,
L. P. PADGETT,
D. J. RIORDAN,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I have not any desire to occupy the time of the House unless there is some objection to the report.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. PADGETT, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was agreed to was laid on the table.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, in 1923 the American Navy will be superior to the British Navy in first-line battleships by from 26½ to 40 per cent and will be capable of defeating the navies of any three nations combined, excepting Great Britain.

We will have 26.5 per cent more actual dreadnaught tonnage than Great Britain, with tremendous superiority in large guns and more modern ships, and the supremacy of the seas will once more rest with America, provided Congress will immediately enact legislation that will give a living wage for enlisted and commissioned personnel.

With officers and men dissatisfied and disheartened, with skeleton crews, with few ships in full commission, with the desertion of practically 5,000 men during the past six months, the finest and most destructive engines of naval warfare will soon become mere masses of cold steel, of little fighting value, and all because of the niggardly salaries prescribed for men who by law are compelled to stay in the military service or who disregard the shame of a destroyed character record besmirched with the charge of desertion from what ought to be the most noble service in the gift of the Government.

Underpaid officers and men mean unhappy ships, and unhappy ships mean desertions, inefficiency, and a second-class Navy in offensive and defensive warfare, despite superiority in steel tonnage.

The average age of an ensign is 24½ years, yet 21 per cent of the ensigns in the Navy are married.

The average age of lieutenants, junior grade, is 27 years and 48 per cent of them are married.

The average age of lieutenants is 31.7 years, with 68 per cent married.

The average age of lieutenant commander is 37 years, with 83 per cent married.

The average age of commander is 44 years, with 90 per cent married.

The average age of captain is 52 years, with 90 per cent married.

The conference report now before the House provides for the appointment of a committee which will report to Congress on the first Monday of January, 1921, with a complete reclassification of grades and pay for officers and men in all branches of the military service of the Government, and I am in hopes that this committee will see the wisdom of further increases in pay, not only for those men in active service, but for those who have given the best part of their lives to the service and are now on the retired list, either because of old age or because of disability incurred in the line of duty.

Mr. Speaker, the high cost of living has hit the retired officer and his family just as seriously as it has those in the active service, and just why the suggestion of economy should eliminate the retired patriots from participation in this really emergency measure is something hard to explain and quite unnatural.

I thoroughly approve of the economy which is being practiced by the Republican steering committee of the House, and I have taken much pleasure in assisting in this direction in every way possible, but economy and justice must go hand in hand together, otherwise there will be a serious disruption of governmental affairs which will not be easily remedied and which will incur the displeasure of the country, to the detriment of those whose honesty of purpose may be destroyed by poor judgment, and it is for this reason that I have steadfastly maintained that officers and men whose salaries have not been raised for 13 years should now be dealt with in no parsimonious manner, and that from the highest to the lowest should be made proud of the service which most of them have selected as a life's work.

I will not in all probability be a member of the committee for the reclassification of grades and pay, but I am quite certain that Congress and the people of the country generally do not desire the military service of the Government to be composed of men who must apologize for themselves or for the appearance of their families, and I shall therefore do everything in my power to bring about such increases in their pay as will make for happy ships, as well as happy homes, and until this has been accomplished the American Navy will not be a success.

Mr. Speaker, the Army and Navy are to-day in a very sad way because of disastrous shortage of officers and men, while good, experienced, able men are quitting the services, not because they want to but because they can not exist on the pay the Government allows them.

Young men are refusing to join either branch of the service because the men already in are dissatisfied and dropping out as fast as their enlistments expire.

Men whom the Government trained as specialists, on whom it depends to solve technical problems, men who were destined to spend all their lives in the Army or the Navy, and who with these careers in view were educated at Government expense at West Point and Annapolis, are abandoning their professions because the United States will not give them a living wage.

Retirements, honorable discharges, and desertions are destroying the instruments of national self-defense at a period in the world's history when America has forged to the front as the world's financial, industrial, political, social, and peaceful center.

Mr. Speaker, I am sure that every Member of the House knows the editorial sentiment of the metropolitan press of the country from San Francisco to New York and from the Canadian line to the Gulf.

In a smashing editorial on October 28 of last year the Chicago Tribune referred to the "pinch-penny policy" of the Government as being destructive of both branches of the military service, as being wasteful, dishonest, parsimonious, and without justice toward men who spend their lives in the maintenance of our defense, and whom we expect to be the first to lay down their lives for our national honor and safety.

The editorial follows:

PINCH-PENNY POLICY.

Public opinion should give prompt and effective support to the proposals for increasing the pay of Navy and Army officers. An ensign in the Navy or second lieutenant in the Army gets $1,700 a year. Each has had four years of drastic professional training. A lieutenant, junior grade, Navy, first lieutenant, Army, gets $2,000. A lieutenant in the Navy, captain in the Army, gets $2,400. A lieutenant commander, Navy, major, Army, $3,000. A commander, Navy, lieutenant colonel, Army, $3,500. A captain, Navy, colonel, Army, $4,000. Rear admiral or commodore (lower half) Navy, brigadier general, Army, $6,000. Rear admiral (upper half), Navy, major general, Army, $8,000. Vice admiral, second in command of fleet, Navy, lieutenant general, Army, $9,000. Admiral commanding fleet, Navy, general, Army, $10,000.

Some increases are allowed for years of service. But the above sets forth sufficiently the scale of pay upon which our Government compensates (?) men who are expected to possess exacting professional acquirements and to display in our defense in times of national peril the highest qualities of character.

The policy we follow is the nadir of stupidity. Its inevitable effects are just now especially apparent. We are losing from the service much of the best material brought out by the war. While plumbers and carpenters are having their wages jumped and the cost of living has gone sky-high, many of the most spirited and intelligent of our officers' corps are leaving or planning on leaving the service because the pressure is too great. Those who remain are either those who lack initiative or are unable to make the change for one reason or another, or are able to stay because of private means, or are exceptionally willing to make heavy personal sacrifice to remain in the service of a country which seems to be willing to exploit patriotism.

This is not economy. It is waste. It is not honest. It is parsimony and injustice. We have just had demonstration of what the defense of the Nation means in intelligent effort and sacrifice. We ought to feel now, above all things, our duty to provide decently for the men who spend their lives in the maintenance of our defense, and whom we expect to be the first to lay down their lives for our national honor and safety.

On April 6 of this year the Chicago Tribune, in another characteristic editorial, "Pay for the officers," says that failure to give Army officers a decent remuneration will drive those officers out of the service, and without competent officers the Army must dwindle to insignificance. The editorial correctly states that Army officers are quitting the service by hundreds because they lack the common necessities of life, and that failure to maintain them properly is a waste of Government energy. It says further, "We are living in the shadow of the greatest war of all times. Shall we throw away our defenses?" The editorial follows:

PAY FOR THE OFFICERS.

That lamentable lack of prescience which sends men into war without arms and information of the dangers to be met with is maneuvering in Congress to increase the pay of naval officers only.

Those who favor increases only for the Navy are our old friends the "springers to arms." They are perfectly well aware that the failure to give the Army officers a decent remuneration will drive those officers out of the service. They are perfectly well aware that without competent officers the Army must dwindle to insignificance. They must be aware that with only a feeble gesture posing as the military strength of a great Nation we shall be in a miserable posture of defense.

Pay the naval officers, who justly are the first line of defense. But pay also the Army officers, who must keep everlastingly on the alert to maintain the framework upon which in times of stress we must construct our civilian armies.

March 21 ought to be a date well fixed in the minds of those who ignore defense. They may take good advice out of reading now of what happened to the British Army on the Somme on March 21, 1918. The British were bold and tenacious. But they lacked skill. The tens of thousands of British who fell before the German advance of March, 1918, ought to remind us that defense is of two parts—preparation and accomplishment.

Skill is the one thing which reposes in the trained minds of the Regular officers. They are quitting the Army by hundreds because they lack common necessities. They have been schooled and trained for the Government defense. The failure to maintain them properly is a waste of Government energy.

This is a dangerous period in international history. Revolt and warfare have not been abolished. We are living in the shadow of the greatest war of all times. Shall we throw away our defenses?

Mr. Speaker, on March 22 of this year the Chicago Herald-Examiner declared its approval of pay increases for the Army and the Navy in a "No pay—no Navy" editorial, and, after calling attention to an 84 per cent increase in the cost of living since the present rate of pay has been in effect, it says, "No wonder the Regular officer patches his own uniform."

This editorial very properly says, "In times of peace a man with brains and executive ability will not go into a service which will not pay him enough to live on. In time of war he will. Then idealism controls." Those are true words, Mr. Speaker. The editorial follows:

NO PAY, NO NAVY.

Something over 1,200 naval officers have either resigned or applied for discharge since the war. The Navy is at present short approximately 40 per cent of the officers and men allowed it by Congress. A destroyer placed in commission this month should have had 8 officers and 120 men. She had 3 officers and 1 man.

The situation in the Army is similar. The present pay bill is of the vintage of 1908. The cost of living has increased in the 12 years about 84 per cent, according to the statistical report presented to Congress. No wonder the Regular officer patches his own uniform!

The Senate bill, known as the Wadsworth-Kelley bill, is a combination of two suggestions, one to increase the pay of enlisted men in the Navy, the other to increase the pay of officers not only in the Navy but also in the Army and allied services, such as the Marine Corps and the Nurses' Corps.

The bill calls for an increase in officers' pay not of 84 per cent but of 30 per cent. The total increase is $60,000,000. In other words, the chairman of the steering committee prefers saving $60,000,000 to saving the Navy.

For that is about what it amounts to. A good naval or Army officer takes a heavy responsibility. He has to have brains and executive ability. But in times of peace a man with brains and executive ability will not go into a service which will not pay him enough to live on.

In time of war he will. Then idealism controls.

But anybody who expects a man who can go into the open market and sell his ability for a dollar to take 50 cents and a pat on the back is strangely lacking in common sense. At the present rate of pay, the roster of the Navy will rapidly come to look like a directory of Leadville—lots of names, but nobody there now.

The House should pass the Wadsworth-Kelley bill; and the Representative who does not use his influence with the economical MONDELL to get a chance to pass it is in a fair way to need an extra secretary to explain the matter to his constituents.

On March 22 of this year the Chicago Daily Journal evidenced its feelings for the national defense when it said that thousands would quit the service unless the pay was quickly raised, and its editorial, "Pay for our officers," finishes with "Congress is paltering with the national safety when it holds up the increased pay bill." A very sensible conclusion. The editorial follows:

PAY FOR OUR OFFICERS.

The American people need an efficient Army. They can get such an Army only by maintaining a sufficient number of properly trained officers. They can find and keep such officers only by paying adequate salaries, and the bill to provide such salaries is now tied up in a jangle between House and Senate.

Officers by thousands have quit the service because they can not live on their present stipend. Other thousands will quit unless the pay is raised, and that quickly. There is nothing mercenary about their attitude. They are willing to take part of their reward in the consciousness of duty done, but they can not care for their families without more pay. Modern industry is eager to get men with a West Point education, and unless their country will provide livable incomes in the Army they will have to heed the industrial call.

Congress is paltering with the national safety when it holds up the increased pay bill.

Under the caption "Inadequate pay in the Navy," Frank J. Sprague says in the New York Evening Post of March 9, 1920, that salaries in practically every walk of life have been increased from 25 per cent to 60 per cent while Naval and Army officers find themselves singled out for distressingly unfair treatment at the hands of Congress and their Government, while being unable to meet their current obligations. He says:

There is a limit to what men with family duties and obligations can stand, despite that Navy spirit which has made the corps unsurpassed. With a knowledge of the conditions in the service and the disheartenment now universally felt by the officers, I know that if that simple measure of justice which in common decency is due them, and which is vital to their efficiency, is not granted, many of them will undoubtedly resign, because they simply can not support their families on their present pay.

With every industry raising its rate of compensation, every marketable product doubled in value, every mechanic demanding and receiving a living wage to meet the increased cost of living, and every college and university raising the pay of its teaching staff from 25 to 60 per cent, until the pay of a professor, with all the advantages of fixed habitation and limited duties, exceeds the pay of the captain of a battleship, officers find themselves singled out for distressingly unfair treatment and simply can not meet their current obligations, many of which are inseparable from and particularly incident to their position and imposed method of living.

If this country wants and intends to have an efficient fighting force it must pay its officers and men, who necessarily suffer many personal and domestic hardships foreign to civilian life, a reasonable and just compensation. If not, it will pay a much heavier amount as the penalty for its niggardly policy.

Mr. Speaker, much has been said in and out of Congress of the so-called propaganda of officers and men in the service to promote a living wage scale, and I am therefore glad to call to the attention of the House an editorial appearing in the Sun and New York Herald of March 30, 1920, "It isn't pernicious 'propaganda' to want to clothe and feed your children," and I will take this occasion to compliment the writer of that editorial on his wisdom.

Practically everything that is done in Congress is done because of the necessity of that particular act, and necessity might well promote activity which, in turn, is labeled "propaganda," when that particular necessity does not meet with the approval of the person in authority.

There is a "propaganda" on right now for increased pay for postal employees all over the country, and no one can successfully contradict the statement that they are the poorest paid employees in the Government service, and that the Postal Service itself is practically demoralized and thoroughly inefficient because of that fact, and yet the commission "sitting" on the reclassification of salaries for that service continues to sit, and sit, and sit, while not only employees but everybody in the country interested in adequate Postal Service is clamoring for just recognition of an existing condition.

It is true that there is not only necessity but unrest in practically every walk of life at the present time, and while industrial managers are meeting the emergency halfway we in Congress are inclined to criticize our underpaid heroes when they suggest salary increases to meet actual living expenses.

The editorial follows:

IT ISN'T PERNICIOUS "PROPAGANDA" TO WANT TO CLOTHE AND FEED YOUR CHILDREN.

In the House of Representatives and in the Senate there are legislators who say officers of the Army and the Navy have been so active in urging increases in pay for themselves and their comrades that their solicitations constitute a propaganda.

Propaganda is hateful, these lawmakers declare, and therefore they are preparing to oppose, or at best not to support, bills to raise soldiers' and sailors' pay.

If there is propaganda by military and naval officers for more pay, it is propaganda which began in the departments when their civilian heads saw the services under their direction falling to pieces as the trained and expert men in them resigned by tens and scores and hundreds because they could not live on their pay.

If there is propaganda for more pay by military and naval officers, it is not propaganda set going and maintained by the expenditure of money to attain a desired end; it is propaganda which began when military and naval officers found themselves not able to pay their bills, not able to buy the clothing their wives and their babies needed, not able to get the food their dependents wanted and ought to have.

If there is propaganda for more pay by military and naval officers, it is not financed and maintained by rich men to enforce a laudable but unpopular reform. It is propaganda which has not the money to put page advertisements in the newspapers or to sow circular letters broadcast. It is propaganda which is maintained by the personal labor of proud men who have been compelled by actual poverty to bare to the world their desperate plight.

When the word propaganda is used the hearer visualizes well-fed, well-clothed, well-paid agents skilled in the arts of persuasion, professionally keen to accomplish their object, but in many cases personally without interest in it and lacking conviction concerning it.

If anybody in Washington or outside of Washington wants to put the label propaganda on the efforts of military and naval officers to get living pay for the work they do, he may do so, but it is not the propaganda of paid press agents, subsidized orators, and deceived sympathizers. It is propaganda, if the word is to be used, of loyal, hard-working, efficient gentlemen who see the national services to which they devote their lives collapsing because the men in them do not get enough money to pay the butcher, the baker, the tailor. It is propaganda, if the word must be used, of men who ask only enough to live on in their country that they may perhaps win the opportunity to die for their country; of men who serve faithfully under any hardships which affect only themselves, but who do not count it part of the duty of a rich nation's servants to clothe their families in rags, to feed their wives and children half rations, and to send their sons and daughters to work when they should be in school.

Mr. Speaker, the New York Tribune of March 27, 1920, printed a letter from a naval officer's wife, in which she said that she intended to use all her influence to compel her husband to resign from the Navy and find some other position which would pay a living wage. I think this letter might reasonably be inserted in the RECORD as coming, not from one, but from the wives of a thousand naval officers. The letter follows:

FROM A NAVAL OFFICER'S WIFE.

To the EDITOR OF THE TRIBUNE.

SIR: In your paper this morning there is an article pertaining to the failure of the House steering committee to take any decisive action regarding the increase in pay for the officers and men of our military forces.

I am a naval officer's wife and we have two daughters. Since the cost of living has been steadily soaring it's been a mighty difficult task to keep our girls even decently clothed. Having them well dressed is out of the question on our meager income. As for myself, an Easter suit this year would mean one-third of our monthly salary. Now, we must maintain a certain social status and my husband's uniforms must always be immaculate. Under the existing conditions all this makes life "one darn bill after another" and is causing discontent and lack of interest among both the officers and the enlisted men.

Before long, if something is not forthcoming, our Navy will be without officers or men to man the ships. Personally, I surely intend to use all my influence to compel my husband to resign and find some other position which will pay a living wage.

Is it fair that after serving the country all through its crisis their request for an increase in pay should be tossed around like an old glove and finally consigned to the scrap heap?

A NAVAL OFFICER'S WIFE.

In an editorial on Saturday, April 17, of this year, the New York Times requests Congress to "pass the pay bill," and says that if the question of increasing the pay of the officers and men of the Army and Navy were submitted to a country-wide referendum Congress would be directed to send the amended Senate bill to the President; and a little further down the same editorial says there could be no worse economy than denying the rank and file of the Army and Navy adequate pay, enough to live on decently, and driving the brightest and most efficient officers into civil life to the detriment, impairment, and decay of both services. The editorial follows:

PASS THE PAY BILL.

If the question of increasing the pay of the officers and men of the Army and Navy were submitted to a country-wide referendum, Congress would be directed to send the amended Senate bill to the President. To hold otherwise would be to doubt the loyalty of the American people to the first line of defense, the Navy, and to the Regular Army, which won imperishable fame on so many hard-fought fields in France. The Senate bill as amended by the Kelley bill, which provided for increased pay only to the enlisted men of the Navy, would raise the rate for officers and men in both the sea and land forces, including the Marine Corps, for the Coast Guard, and the Public Health Service. * * *

There could be no worse "economy" than denying the rank and file of the Army and Navy adequate pay, enough to live on decently, and driving the brightest and most efficient officers into civil life, to the detriment, impairment, and decay of both services. Despairing of obtaining justice from Congress, several hundred officers have relinquished their posts in the Navy, and in the last six months of 1919 there were 4,666 desertions of enlisted men and petty officers. This was the testimony of Rear Admiral Thomas Washington, Chief of the Bureau of Navigation, before a Senate Naval Affairs Subcommittee.

"Literally thousands of resignations are pending," said Admiral Washington, "not one ship in the Navy is completely manned. Battleships average 70 per cent of their full complement, and some destroyers have as few as two to six men aboard. The Naval Academy can not turn out enough officers in 10 years to fill the gaps. It is an awful showing."

On February 10 Representative CRAGO, of the House Military Affairs Committee, said that since November 11, 1918, more than 2,180 officers had resigned their commissions in the Army, or one out of every five.

"The great depreciation in the purchasing power of the dollar is exerting economic pressure on the Army which is seriously depressing its morale," wrote Secretary Baker on December 23, 1919. There have since been almost four more months of demoralization. * * * Underpay the sea and land forces, deny them a square deal, and the result must be a slackening of discipline, a marked decline in efficiency, which would mean ever-growing insecurity of the country.

The Philadelphia Inquirer on March 26, 1920, editorially says that "Congress is unjust to the Army officers," and that "there is no excuse whatever for holding up the proposed increases of pay in the military and naval services," and says further, that "As a matter of fact, it is not economy but waste, to foster retirement of officers who have been trained for their work at Government expense."

The editorial which I regard as a good one, follows:

UNJUST TO THE ARMY OFFICERS.

There is no excuse whatever for the action of the House steering committee in holding up the proposed increases of pay in the military and naval services. The objection offered is to the increase in the case of Army officers alone; but the others are halted meanwhile. The unfairness of this is obvious; no plea of economy can justify it. As a matter of fact, it is not economy but waste to force the retirement of officers who have been trained for their work at Government expense.

That the increase in the cost of living has made an increase of pay necessary has been completely demonstrated. Army, Navy, Marine Corps, Public Health Service, Coast and Geodetic Survey—all are in the same boat in this respect. The services of all are vital to the national welfare. Members have made many sacrifices in the past, they have accepted cheerfully lower salaries than their abilities could have commanded in private employment; but there is a limit to their power as well as their willingness to do this. The obligation to support themselves and their families is one they can not escape.

The need of governmental economy is very great. The late Senator Aldrich once named the very large sum which could be saved yearly if the Government were operated on business principles. But the trouble with the congressional method of economizing is that it too often wastes at the tap and saves at the bunghole. It lops off necessary expenditures here and there, but lets extravagance on a large scale go on as usual.

The Washington Times, on March 18, 1920, called attention to the "serious plight of the United States Navy," in the desertions and resignations of petty officers and men, and says, "These petty officers are the instructors and leaders in every department of the ships. They are really the backbone of the service," and a little further down the editorial says, "The dangerous part of the shortage is that it is the skilled men, mostly mechanics who have left the Navy, and that it is now a notoriously known fact that hundreds of costly vessels are without crews, some with just a few men to care for them."

As a final shot at Congress, Bill Price concludes his editorial with "Don't monkey with the Navy, Congress." The editorial follows:

THE SERIOUS PLIGHT OF THE UNITED STATES NAVY.

(By Bill Price.)

The grave situation in the Navy is finally forcing leaders of Congress to the conclusion that if they do not abandon time-killing and niggardly economies the United States may be confronted with a disastrously weakened condition of the fighting force upon which the country mainly depends in the event of foreign aggression or atttack.

The trouble is due to the poor compensation paid to officers and men. So many thousands of valuable men have left the Navy that it is now a notoriously known fact that hundreds of costly vessels are without crews, some with just a few men to care for them.

The dangerous part of the shortage is that it is the skilled men, mostly mechanics, who have left the Navy. But even of the ordinary deckhands 70 per cent are boys under 20 years of age. The figures are really alarming. The Navy is to-day over 40,000 skilled men short, and the personnel is being depleted as fast as skilled men can get out and obtain positions paying two or three times as much money.

These petty officers are the instructors and leaders in every department of the ships. They are really the backbone of the service.

And why don't they stay in the Navy? A civilian machinist on shore, often less of an expert than his brother in the Navy, receives at least $6 per day, with overtime, and his work is done within eight hours.

A chief machinist's mate on shipboard, whose qualifications must be high, who is a minor officer over others, and whose daily work extends over many hours, gets approximately $2.75 per day for his first enlistment, $83 per month. After 20 years in the Navy he will get $99 per month. The most money the highest paid enlisted man can possibly send his family, whom he often fails to see for months at a time, is $70. Many chief petty officers can not send home over $40. Do you see why the Navy is being weakened? These men receive far less pay than common laborers.

The Kelley bill, which passed the House in January, carried increased pay for officers and all enlisted men. The Senate has also passed legislation along somewhat different lines. A conference of the two Houses is the necessary step to handle the matter and provide legislation to maintain the efficiency and morale of the Navy. False economy will lose the Government more in one year in deterioration of equipment and personnel than it would have to pay out in two years in increased salaries.

Don't monkey with the Navy, Congress!

Mr. Speaker, when it is generally understood that a Chicago bricklayer, carpenter, plumber, plasterer, steam fitter, or electrician earns as much money per day as the base pay of an officer in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps who has given 15 years of the best period of his life to his chosen profession, I am sure that no one will say that the very small increases carried in the conference report are anything but just and reasonable, while at the same time being much lower than salaries paid in industrial directions where the same intelligence, efficiency, and honesty of purpose are required.

In the determination of pay for officers it should be accepted as a basic principle that every officer should receive a salary which, while insuring the fullest measure of efficient service in his exacting profession, will permit him to marry, bring up and educate a family, aid him in maintaining the offical and social position imposed upon him, and inseparable from his status, and leave a reasonable margin for unusual emergency, modest savings, and for safeguarding his family from want by suitable insurance.

In this I know that every Member of Congress will agree with me; and unless we proceed along those lines we can not hope for a Navy that, man for man and ship for ship, can lick anything afloat.

Mr. Speaker, men in all walks of life have several times been granted increased wages and salaries since 1914, to meet the growing cost of living, but Army and Navy officers have not had even one increase over the pay fixed a dozen years ago.

While I fully appreciate the necessity of a thoroughly efficient and complete enlisted personnel, I also feel that nothing is more important to the Nation's safety than trained officers of a high standard of excellence, morale, and ambitious interests among those whose privilege and duty it is to keep our country safe in an emergency domestic or foreign in nature.

National defense is cheap at any price, yet a peculiar economy of our Government is now imperiling our defense. We have come through the war with a remarkable record of performance in spite of unpreparedness, and now the men who were largely responsible for the rapid and efficient expansion of our national arms are being allowed to drop into civil life because they can not live on the old salaries of the Army and Navy.

Mr. Speaker, it will be a serious matter when none but the sons of the rich can afford to hold commissions in the Army and Navy. This condition has long characterized the diplomatic service, to the great loss of the Nation.

Congress has been quite liberal in providing funds for the construction of a great Navy—soon to be the greatest in all the world—and it can not now be penny-wise in leaving battleships, cruisers, and destroyers with an insufficient quota of men, through unwillingness to pay fair wages; nor should the American officer suffer in his pride over being unable to support his family in a style befitting his station.

With everybody admitting that conditions are such that either salaries must be raised or standards must suffer, I am quite sure that Congress will not find any difficulty in completely justifying the salary increases provided for in the conference report now before the House.

The Atlantic Fleet has just put into New York Harbor after its winter cruise and target practice off the coast of Cuba, and, although the fleet has been away from our shores for many months, it is a curious as well as a serious fact that very few wives of commissioned officers attached to the fleet met their husbands upon their arrival at New York.

Mr. Speaker, this simple statement tells a sad story. It means that wives and children can not journey to the big city, where hotels are expensive and every form of amusement costs so much; that the pay of the officer simply can not stand the strain, and wife and family are therefore told to stay at home until the head of the house can journey to them at his own expense after he has been given permission by his superior officer to "leave ship" for a few days.

A condition of this kind certainly can not make for efficiency, and is a decidedly unfair deal for officers as well as their families, and one which would not be countenanced for a moment by Members of Congress if it applied to themselves.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, when in the closing days of the last Congress the Republicans of the Senate filibustered to death the appropriation bills, their declared purpose was to force the President to call an extraordinary session of Congress in order that they might commence work upon their program of reconstruction legislation. In response to the call of the President, the Congress convened on May 19, 1919. A year has now passed and Congress, instead of enacting any legislation of a constructive nature, has devoted its time to the prosecution of a series of political investigations which for futility and extravagance are unparalleled in the history of Congress. Congress has not only wasted a year but has wasted more than a million dollars of the money of the people. Through the favor of these committees, many highly paid parasites have fastened themselves on to the pay roll of the Government, and unless the House takes some action March 4 next will find them still drawing their excessive salaries. Some of these committees have not made a report. At least one has never entered upon the specific investigation it was directed to make. The Republican leaders tell us that the Congress is to adjourn in June, and, if this is true, then the House owes it to itself and to the country to require these committees to go to work and complete their investigations before this session ends, so that there may be an end to the indefensibly extravagant expenditures. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Because of this extravagance and because of the methods pursued by these committees, I have introduced a resolution providing for the appointment of a committee to investigate the investigating committees, which, I trust, the steering committee of the Republicans will permit their Committee on Rules to consider.

In justification of the resolution I have introduced, let me call your attention to the fact that more than 50 investigations have been authorized by this Congress covering every activity of the Government during the Democratic administration. The business of every executive department of the Government has been interfered with. Witnesses have been summoned at the expense of the taxpayers from every section of the country. The Senate has conducted as many, or more, investigations than has the House. What they have cost I do not know and can not comment upon. We do know that from the House contingent fund, as far back as February, 1920, $150,000 was allotted for House investigations. Of course, this will not begin to cover the expense, and how much more we will be called upon to pay through this fund no one can estimate. This does not include the cost of printing the hearings or of franking the hearings through the mails. In every executive department hundreds of clerks have been employed in preparing data to be furnished upon the request of some of the employees of these committees, and while no accurate statement can be made, every man familiar with the situation will agree that the total expense to the Government of the investigations by the House and Senate will exceed a million dollars.

When we recall that these committees of the House were appointed to investigate the alleged extravagances in the executive departments, it is interesting, but depressing, to examine the statement of their own expenditures, which is contained in the hearings upon the second deficiency appropriation bill, page 1014.

A few instances will justify the adoption of my resolution:

The Committee on Expenditures in the War Department appointed a subcommittee on ordnance, of which Mr. GRAHAM was chairman. The investigating work of this committee has been practically controlled by a man named D. J. Bennett. This man filed an application with the Civil Service Commission in January, 1918, for the departmental service, stating that he would accept a salary of $1,000 per annum. He was appointed in the War Department and served in the equipment section until November, 1918, when he was transferred to the Quartermaster Corps as a clerk, his salary being $1,800. He made himself so obnoxious to his superior officials that when, in December, there was a reduction in personnel in that office his name was suggested for transfer to the statistical branch, which branch needed additional employees. Because his reputation had preceded him, that department at first refused to accept him, but finally agreed to give him a trial. His conduct there was such that at the end of a month they sought to transfer him, but two months elapsed before they could find a division that would take him. He was then transferred to the War Claims Board. Prying into papers with which he had no business at all, he would make notations upon them criticizing the judgment and the character of executive officers and inspectors. In some instances these files were sent to the field without knowledge of his notations and caused dissension among officials. He seemingly questioned the honesty of everybody but himself. This trait doubtless suggested his suitability for employment with the investigating committees. At any rate, he tendered his resignation one afternoon and the next morning presented at the office in which he had to that date been employed, credentials as investigator of the congressional investigating committee. He had overnight increased his compensation from the $1,800 he received in the War Department to $3,600 and expenses, paid by the committee investigating extravagance in the War Department. Since that time he has had access to every paper in the office of the War Claims Board. A desk is assigned to him and he has the privilege of commanding stenographic and clerical assistance. The official in charge of the War Claims Board told him that if in the settlement of any contract he could find where the Government could save a dollar he would be glad to be advised of it, but as the months have passed he has never once suggested that in any contract a saving could be made. Previous to his work in the department it is said that Mr. Bennett was a tinsmith, and this village tinsmith has been assigned by the House investigating committee to pass upon the settlements made by the War Department in the cancellation of contracts for leather, textiles, copper, and steel, involving millions of dollars. His opinion, based upon his business experience prior to entering the Government service, when he earned a salary of $75 per month, is presented to us and to the country in reports by the chairman of the investigating committee, Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois.

In the cancellation of leather contracts millions were involved and the department had consulted the best brains in the industry. To investigate such contracts the committee summoned as an expert investigator an employee of the Rock Island Arsenal, located in the district represented by the chairman of the committee, Mr. GRAHAM. The investigator, Mr. C. D. Worley, was employed at the Rock Island Arsenal on a machine sewing leather. For the month of August, 1919, the last month he served there, he received a compensation of $131.30. This, of course, qualified him to pass upon the settlement of these contracts involving millions of dollars, and the committee investigating extravagance in the War Department immediately increased his compensation to $208 a month and expenses. In October, 1919, his expenses were given as $107.85, and in September as $92.45. Since that time there is no mention of what became of the investigator, but I trust that he is a grateful man and he will turn up in time for the November election.

The committee on investigation of camps was, of course, seriously handicapped, because the Military Committee, not wishing to be sidetracked in a summary manner, conducted an extensive investigation of all the camps of the country, traveling from State to State at an expense to the taxpayers of $2,500. But in order to emphasize the importance of its investigation, as compared with that of the Military Committee, the investigating committee has spent about $25,000 instead of $2,500. It was not difficult for them to make this expenditure, because you know that it is necessary to employ counsel to investigate camps. They therefore employed a Mr. Chatland, who was formerly employed by the Federal Trade Commission at a salary of $333.33 per month. The committee investigating the extravagances of the War Department paid him $1,000 per month. Of course he could not do all the legal work, so in addition to counsel they paid another gentleman for "preparing law brief."

Then there is the Ansell subcommittee. Gen. Ansell was receiving in the Judge Advocate Corps of the War Department a salary of $4,500 per year, and commutation and heat allowance of $1,000 when he resigned on July 21, 1919. On the next day he was employed by the committee investigating extravagances in the War Department at a salary of $20,000 a year and expenses, and was furnished a "secretary," who is receiving a salary at the rate of $1,500 a year.

Mr. IRELAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I regret I can not, because I have but 20 minutes and I have something else to say.

I refer to it as the Ansell subcommittee because the two Republican members constituting the majority of the committee adopted a resolution authorizing Gen. Ansell to conduct the hearings in the absence of any member of the committee, and the General has doubtless had a splendid time summoning and cross-examining officers of the service with which he was formerly connected. What I do not understand is, if the committee members will not listen to the Ansell hearings, how do they expect anybody else to read them. This committee was charged with the duty of investigating foreign expenditures.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I will not, unless the gentleman questions the accuracy of my statement.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. I wish to explain that the filibuster was going on on the report of this committee at that time.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. The gentleman will have lots of explanations to make.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield there? The gentleman wants to be fair.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. If you contradict the statement of fact that he has not conducted the hearings in your absence and in the absence of every other Member, I will yield. Otherwise I can not.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. During the filibuster on the floor of this House against the report of the main committee——

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Representative FLOOD, a member of this committee, states that he walked into the room where the hearings were held and saw Gen. Ansell conducting the hearing in the absence of any member of the committee. When he protested, Gen. Ansell stated he was proceeding by direction of the Republican members of the committee. Mr. FLOOD placed in the record his protest against it, and the chairman promised him it would not occur again, and on a subsequent occasion he went into the room and again found Gen. Ansell conducting the hearings in the absence of any member of the committee. [Applause on the Democratic side.] This Congress delegated to this committee the power to investigate, and they ought to know that they have not the power to delegate that power to anybody else.

To date I have noticed that they were investigating the court-martial system, the condition of the jails in Paris, the strategy of the Army in continuing to fight on armistice day, and many other interesting subjects, but I fear they will never get down to foreign expenditures before March 4 next.

But this extravagance is not confined entirely to the investigations of the War Department. The committee investigating the Shipping Board, according to the Clerk of the House, has a clerk and statistician at $700 per month. Then they have another clerk at $200 per month. I presume these clerks were needed in order to arrange for the trip the committee made to the Pacific coast in a private car. I am informed that four members made the trip and the party did not exceed eight. They had to pay $50 a day for the car, and in order to secure it had to buy 25 tickets, or pay fares for 25 persons. The dignity of the House was preserved, but I do not know what effect it had upon the officials of the department whose alleged extravagances were being investigated.

I trust the Members of the House will read the statement furnished by the Clerk of the House, and from it learn the extravagances of these committees. For instance, on page 1017 of the hearings you will find under the expenditures of "subcommittee No. 5, ordnance," the following:

Accountants.	Salaries.	Expenses.
George W. Storck, at $50:
Aug. 20, services and expenses, 4 days	$200.00	$193.78
Aug. 18, 19, 20, 21, services and expenses, 4 days	200.00	147.79

An expense item of $193.78 for four days means $48.44 a day, which, even in these days of high cost of living, is a liberal expense account for a man investigating the extravagances of Army officers who, when away from headquarters, receive no allowance for expenses other than mileage. That the same date, August 20, is included in both items is one of the matters than can doubtless be explained satisfactorily, if the investigation I ask for is ordered.

But, Mr. Speaker, how futile have been these investigations. When the original resolution for the investigation of the War Department was considered, the chairman of the Republican congressional committee stated that the investigation would be made "to secure facts as a groundwork for needed relief legislation in the immediate future." Immediate future! Why, a year has passed, and I challenge you to point to any relief legislation that has been proposed, much less enacted into law. That this was but a hollow pretense and that their true purpose was to endeavor to secure material for the coming campaign was early evidenced by the conduct of the investigations. Oh, how hopeful you were! How you longed for a thief! Surely, you thought, out of all the thousands of Army officers who were engaged in the purchase of supplies there must be some who were guilty of fraud and whose fraud you could charge up to the Democratic administration. In anticipation of the great exposures the Republican national committee assigned to daily attend the hearings, one of the best publicity men in the country. It was his business to prepare the copy to send to the newspaper correspondents revealing the fraud and corruption of the Government of the United States. Copy was sent for a while, but it soon became so patent that the copy was but partisan political propaganda that all reputable newspapers refused to publish it, and the publicity man ceased to attend. This service of the Republican national committee was based on the theory that newspaper correspondents are busy men, have not the time to regularly attend hearings, and if you give them "copy" they will publish it, and in this way you can "put over" poison gas that would not ordinarily be accepted. It is the same policy that actuates the Republican publicity committee, of which ex-Senator Jonathan Bourne is president, and Representative MARTIN MADDEN is treasurer. This committee sends out to the press for publication a series of articles entitled "Uncle Ted's Bedtime Stories." These stories detail imaginary conversations between Uncle Ted and two children, Jack and Ruth, about governmental affairs, and always attack the President of the United States, making false statements as to his official acts. They are so worded that many reputable newspapers carried them for some time before realizing the use to which their columns were being put. I sincerely trust that the gentleman from Illinois confines his activities to the duties of treasurer and is not guilty of impersonating Uncle Ted. Inexcusable as is this method of attack upon the President, it but shows the poverty of the Republican Party, that they no longer can fool grown people, and have to resort to an effort to fool the children and even wait until bedtime, when the children are sleepy, before they attempt to fool them. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

But while the publicity man was at work the committee handed out some remarkable statements. It was an idle day that there was not an intimation of fraud discovered, and at least on one occcasion the statement was made that a number of Army officers would be criminally prosecuted. A year has passed and not a single man has been arrested; not a single warrant has been issued; and not a single case reported to this House that would justify even a Republican politician in charging an official of the War Department with fraud.

Let us not forget those statements. On July 7, 1919, the chairman of the committee unearthed the most heinous of all crimes. He solemnly announced that the Council of National Defense was "a secret government of the United States." He said, "Behind closed doors, weeks and even months before the war, these seven men designed practically every war measure which Congress subsequently enacted. They devised the entire system of purchasing war supplies, planned a press censorship, designed a system of food control and selected Herbert Hoover as its director, and even determined on the daylight-saving scheme." And yet the money of the taxpayers is to-day being spent by other investigation committees to prove that prior to our entrance into the war no steps were taken to prepare for war. Could greater tribute be paid to any administration? Under the act of Congress the Council of Defense is a peace-time agency, not a war agency. Its duty is in time of peace to acquire and collate information which can be made immediately available for war purposes in time of war. How well these appointees of the President performed their duty is evidenced by the fact that the gentleman from Illinois says that every act they proposed was thereafter adopted by Congress, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM], I have no doubt, voted for every one of them.

And while you are engaged in trying to show that the Council of National Defense was unduly active in preparing for war, Admiral Sims charges that as a result of the failure of the Navy Department to follow his advice the Navy is responsible for the loss of 500,000 men and millions of dollars and delayed the ending of the war at least four months. If a citizen of any other country had made such a charge against the Navy of the United States every Member of Congress would have risen in righteous indignation and repudiated this slander of our Navy. But this is campaign year, and because you think that any attack upon the Navy will serve to discredit the administration, you have not raised a single voice in answer to this charge. Well, you may encourage such attacks, but in behalf of the Navy of the United States the Democratic Members of this House, want you and the country to know that our Navy convoyed across the sea, without the loss of a single life in combat, 2,000,000 men, who turned the tide of battle, SHORTENED the war more than four months, and SAVED more than 500,000 lives. [Applause on the Democratic side.] To serve your political purposes you have encouraged a perfectly good admiral to make charges that have destroyed his prestige in the Navy and discredited him in the Nation.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from South Carolina yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I regret I can not yield.

Mr. MADDEN. I just want to say what I think about the admiral.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I can not yield.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. You criticize the Council of National Defense as the secret Government of the United States, but the American people know that within its ranks the council had patriotic citizens at work in every community serving at a sacrifice to themselves, "doing their bit" for their country. In Washington it served as the unit around which was built the great organization of business men who came to the aid of the Government and so marshaled the resources of the country as to make possible the successful conclusion of the war in so short a time. If there was any fraud on the part of a single individual connected with any of these boards, you have had the opportunity and the means to discover it; and when, after a year's investigation, you have failed to report it, it is conclusive evidence that there was no fraud, and it is time for you to cease reflecting upon the character of these business men who so patriotically served their country.

When the armistice came, more than 26,000 contracts for supplies were canceled, and the duty devolved upon the War Department of making settlement with the contractors. In the cases settled to date the Government has paid only 12 per cent of the total amount of the contracts involved. More than 20,000 men have been engaged in one way or another in the investigation and settlements. As they are human, their judgment is not infallible. They may have made mistakes, but the result speaks well for their judgment, and you have not dared to name a single officer who has been guilty of fraud.

The people have so tired of your smelling committees that even stalwart Republican newspapers now fail to publish your reports. You can not blame them. When you charge that the Government paid more for shoes than it did prior to the war, the American marine says, "Yes; but wearing those shoes we held the Germans at Chateau-Thierry and started them on the return trip to the Fatherland."

When you charge that the Government purchased too much ammunition, the fathers of the boys who saved this Nation answer that no man could tell when the war would end, and you could not purchase too much to make certain the early and successful end of the war.

When you charge that too much was paid for rifles, the doughboy answers that with these rifles they chased the Germans through the Argonne Forest.

When you charge that too much was paid for overcoats, Gen. Goethals tells you that he ordered coats purchased wherever they could be found, and the mothers of America tell you they rejoice that the department did not follow your plan of waiting for "bargain sales," but hastily forwarded coats to protect their boys against the unusually severe winter of 1918.

When you charge that extravagant prices were paid for food, the doughboy again answers that it was good food, and the mothers again rejoice that it did not contain embalmed beef, as in 1898.

Never before has a successful military campaign been investigated as you have attempted to investigate the conduct of the A. E. F. under Pershing. Your subcommittee endeavored to embarrass Gen. Pershing on the day he was leaving France, and he ignored you, as he should have done, advising you that in Washington, where he had sent his files, he would be at your service. Though he has been in this country since September, and in this city the greater part of the time, you have never summoned him. It shows your bad faith. Summon him! Learn from him that which you seem not to know—that WE WON THE WAR. Learn from him also that which is contained in his final report:

> In closing this report, Mr. Secretary, I desire to record my deep appreciation of the unqualified support accorded me throughout the war by the President and yourself. My task was simplified by your confidence and wise counsel.

With this testimony as to the cooperation of the President and the Secretary of War with Gen. Pershing in the success of the American Expeditionary Forces, bring your political investigations to a close. We care not what you report, because the American people have long since discovered the political character of your investigations and have discounted in advance any report you may make. No Democrat opposed your making these investigations. We told you that if any officer of the Army or Navy, or any official of an executive department had been guilty of fraud we were as anxious as you to learn of it. But you have had a year in which to investigate. You have discovered no fraud, and you owe it to the taxpayers of America to put an end to your extravagant expenditures before you recess or adjourn. The time has come for you to put up or shut up. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has expired.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for five minutes more.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that that can not be done.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Do I understand the Speaker objects to a unanimous-consent request?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired, and the Chair has not recognized the gentleman to make a unanimous-consent request.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Does the Chair refuse to entertain a request for unanimous consent to proceed?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not recognize the gentleman to ask for unanimous consent. The Chair will recognize the gentleman to ask leave to extend his remarks.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not recognize the gentleman for that purpose.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Well, the Chair will find out about it. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think it is fair for gentlemen to ask that the business of the House be set aside for what time they wish, and then use that as leverage for getting more time.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. There is nothing up to-day.

The SPEAKER. There is business pending.

NO QUORUM—CALL OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The SPEAKER. No point of order can be made while a point of order is pending. [After counting.] Evidently there is no quorum present.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming moves a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill for amendment.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. The Clerk is not reading the whole bill. He is reading the name and the amount. There are several lines between, and as we are not doing much to-day I think he should read the whole bill. Has the first reading been dispensed with?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The first reading was dispensed with.

Mr. CALDWELL. I did not hear any such request.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Granting a request to consider a bill in the House as in Committee of the Whole dispenses with the first reading of the bill under a ruling by ex-Speaker CLARK.

The Clerk read as follows:

The name of Fred C. Swain, late of Company F, Sixth Regiment Illinois Infantry, War with Spain, and pay him a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 2, line 19, strike out "Swain" and insert "Savin."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

The name of Scott Engle, late of the Twenty-second Battalion United States Field Artillery, Regular Establishment, and pay him a pension at the rate of $17 per month.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word to ask the chairman of the committee a question. Where is the report on this bill? I have tried to get a copy of the report, but have been unable to get it.

Mr. KNUTSON. If the gentleman wishes a copy of the report, I will give him mine.

Mr. CALDWELL. If there is a report, all right. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

The name of Tom S. Bailey, late of Company F, Third Regiment Tennessee Infantry, War with Spain, and pay him a pension at the rate of $17 per month.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, under the ruling of the Speaker this morning, this seems to be very important business before the House, and I think we should have a quorum to do business. I make the point that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. LONGWORTH). The gentleman from Oklahoma makes the point that no quorum is present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and fifty-eight Members present, not a quorum.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the Democratic side of the House wants to oppose pension bills, I move a call of the House.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. CALDWELL) there were 127 ayes and 5 noes.

So the motion was agreed to.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Two hundred and sixty-five Members have answered to their names, a quorum.

Mr. SELLS. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The doors were opened.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The name of William C. Phillips, late of Company I, Sixteenth Regiment United States Infantry, Regular Establishment, and pay him a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word, and I do that for this purpose: To call attention to the fact that the report accompanying this bill was not available at the time the bill was called up for consideration. I want to protest against that practice. I am opposed to the practice of not having reports on bills of this kind printed in time for Members to examine them before the bill comes up. I do not take it that that is the fault of the committee, but the reports nevertheless were not available and were not made available until after the bill was under consideration. I do not think that practice ought to be indulged in, because the membership of the House is entitled to examine these several claims.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKEOWN. Yes.

Mr. KNUTSON. I think the Printing Office was short of paper.

Mr. McKEOWN. I am simply protesting against taking up bills of this kind which carry appropriations without an opportunity on the part of Members of the House to examine the report and the cases.

Mr. KNUTSON. As a general thing, it is a very bad practice.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKEOWN. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I think the gentleman's point is well taken. I am rather inclined to think that if we had all realized the report was not available we might not have taken this bill up for consideration. I think the House ought to have the reports available before bills are taken up, but there is no controversy over any item in this particular bill, so that I do not know if it is important in this case. I do think it is important as a general proposition.

Mr. McKEOWN. The question of whether or not it might be of consequence would arise out of information contained in the report. I have no objection to the bill, and I am not making any objection. I am simply calling the attention of the House to the practice of taking up a bill carrying appropriations without an opportunity to read the report upon the measure.

Mr. SELLS. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Pensions meets on Wednesday of each week. Immediately after the committee meeting the clerk and the examiner of the committee prepare the bills approved for printing. The bills with the reports go to the Public Printer on Wednesday afternoon. That course was pursued in this case and they went to the Public Printer on Wednesday afternoon and they should have been here yesterday morning. That they were delayed is no fault of the Committee on Pensions. We have merely observed the usual practice, heretofore observed in reporting these bills.

Mr. McKEOWN. In that event bills ought not to be called up for consideration, although to-day is pension day, until the House can have opportunity to read the report. I raised this point merely to call the attention of the House to the facts so that in the future we may have opportunity to examine reports.

Mr. BEE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Tennessee yield?

Mr. SELLS. I have not the floor.

Mr. McKEOWN. I yield.

Mr. BEE. Two weeks ago we passed a special bill for Spanish-American War veterans. Does this bill include individuals who do not come under the operation of that law, for whom it is necessary to pass special legislation, or under what circumstances do these claims arise?

Mr. SELLS. H. R. 2, to which the gentleman refers, is a general bill for the relief of Spanish War veterans, and it has not yet become a law.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The name of Conrad C. Kalber, late of Company A, First Regiment Connecticut Infantry, War with Spain, and pay him a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

Mr. SELLS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to return to page 15 for the purpose of offering an amendment to strike out lines 4, 5, and 6.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to return to page 15 for the purpose of offering an amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 15, strike out all of lines 4, 5, and 6.

Mr. SELLS. Mr. Speaker, in that case the claimant is dead.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SELLS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I present a privileged report from the Committee on Appropriations, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Appropriations, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 12610) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and for other purposes, together with the veto message of the President thereon, having considered the same, reports the bill herewith, with the recommendation that it be passed by the House of Representatives, the objections of the President to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman from Tennessee with regard to time. I assume that I have one hour on this matter. At the end of that time I desire to move the previous question, and at the same time I want to yield to the gentleman from Tennessee such time as he may desire.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARNER. Does the gentleman from Iowa have an hour under the rules to discuss the veto message of the President?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would be inclined to think that the gentleman having made a privileged motion would be entitled to the floor for an hour.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, if an hour is not enough, I desire to be entirely fair and I want the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] to have one-half of that time. If that is not sufficient, we will get more time.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I do not know who wants to speak on the matter, but from the information that I now have I think 30 minutes will be ample time on this side, and possibly more than we would need.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I suggest that the gentleman take his hour and yield half of it to those on this side or yield it to me for the purpose of yielding to those gentlemen who want to speak, and if additional time——

Mr. GOOD. I will yield at this time 30 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee, and I ask that he consume that time now.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WINGO. As I understand, the House is reconsidering a bill. Now, does the Speaker rule that that allows one hour to the gentleman who brings up the bill and does not allow an hour to each side?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would think not. The Chair thinks the motion the gentleman from Iowa has made is under the regular rules of the House, and he is entitled to an hour.

Mr. WINGO. I am not protesting against it, but there is some doubt——

Mr. GOOD. And if additional time is wanted, I shall be very glad to ask unanimous consent to grant a little additional time, the time to be equally divided.

Mr. WINGO. I will state that I was not protesting, but I did not know whether, as the bill came up on reconsideration, it would proceed upon one hour to whoever got the floor. I was possibly in error.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that at the end of one hour the previous question be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that at the expiration of one hour the previous question shall be considered as ordered. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman from New York rise?

Mr. CALDWELL. Inasmuch as this is an effort to pass the bill over the President's veto, I think we ought to have a quorum present, and I therefore make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and sixty-seven gentlemen are present; not a quorum.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. On this roll call 269 Members have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa has one hour.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I have yielded 30 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS].

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, the motion before the House is to pass the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, the veto of the President notwithstanding. The objection of the President to the bill as it passed the Congress is based on section 8 of the bill, which I wish to read to the House for its information. It reads as follows:

SEC. 8. That section 11 of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and for other purposes," is hereby amended by striking out the first proviso and inserting the following in lieu thereof:

"Provided, That hereafter no journal, magazine, periodical, or similar Government publication shall be printed, issued, or discontinued by any branch or officer of the Government service unless the same shall have been authorized under such regulations as shall be prescribed by the Joint Committee on Printing, and such publications shall not contain any commercial advertisements: Provided further, That the foregoing provisions of this section shall also apply to mimeographing, multigraphing, and other processes used for the duplication of typewritten and printed matter, other than official correspondence and office records."

Now, the amendment in the act which was approved March 1, 1919, and which this provision I have just read seeks to amend, reads as follows:

SEC. 11. That the Joint Committee on Printing shall have power to adopt and employ such measures as, in its discretion, may be deemed necessary to remedy any neglect, delay, duplication, or waste in the public printing and binding and the distribution of Government publications: Provided, That hereafter no journal, magazine, periodical, or other similar publication shall be printed and issued by any branch or officer of the Government service unless the same shall have been specifically authorized by Congress, but such publications as are now being printed without specific authority from Congress may, in the discretion of the Joint Committee on Printing, be continued until the close of the next regular session of Congress, when, if authority for their continuance is not then granted by Congress, they shall not thereafter be printed: Provided further, That on and after July 1, 1919, all printing, binding, and blank-book work for Congress, the Executive Office, the judiciary, and every executive department, independent office, and establishment of the Government shall be done at the Government Printing Office, except such classes of work as shall be deemed by the Joint Committee on Printing to be urgent or necessary to have done elsewhere than in the District of Columbia for the exclusive use of any field service outside of said District.

Now, if you will analyze the provision which was carried in the current law and the amendment which was adopted, and which I first read, you will see that there is quite a difference.

In other words, on March 1, 1919, Congress undertook to say and did say that after the adjournment of the next regular session no journal, magazine, periodical, and so forth, shall be printed and issued by any branch or officer of the Government unless it is specifically authorized by law. But it provided that in the interim, between that date and the adjournment of the next regular session of Congress, which is the present session, the Joint Committee on Printing should have the power and authority to permit such publications as in its judgment and discretion should be made. The provision which the President has vetoed places the exclusive authority in the Joint Committee on Printing for all time to absolutely determine, regardless of anything that the executive branch may have to say and regardless of anything that Congress may have to say, unless it takes formal action, as to just what publications shall be issued. So I say there is a most material difference between the act as it was passed in March, 1919, and as approved by the President at that time and the provision carried in this bill which he has vetoed.

It is clear that when Congress passed the bill, on March 1, 1919, and when it was approved by the President, it was expected that before the next regular session of Congress should have come to a close Congress would have taken the matter up through its proper legislative committee and adopted some legislation giving authority for the publication of such publications as were deemed necessary. But this Congress has sat here for more than a year and has absolutely failed to consider the matter or to pass any legislation upon the subject as it was expected that it would do when the bill to which I have referred was passed. And it is only another evidence of the fact of the failure of this Congress, although it has been in session more than a year, to grapple with legislative problems and pass legislation needed in order that our Government may properly function.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. This session of Congress has already passed the so-called printing reform bill, which would in itself, if passed in the other body, correct 85 per cent, at least, of this overplus of printing matter, would it not?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is true; and I am glad the gentleman corrected me in so far as this House is concerned. But it so happens that the Senate is a part of the Congress, and the assent of the Senate is necessary in order that a matter may become a law. The other end of the Capitol is controlled by the same party that controls in this House. So I repeat the very difficulty with which we are confronted to-day is due to the inexcusable inactivity of this Congress and its failure to pass legislation that it was expected it would pass in order to take care of this particular matter.

Now, it will be said by those who favor passing this bill over the veto of the President that if you strike this provision out the Government will find itself in a position where practically no publications can be issued after July 1, because I am informed there are some 150 new publications that are being issued for which there is no specific authority of law. But that is no reason, gentlemen, why Congress should undertake to take from the executive branch of the Government by permanent law authority that properly belongs to it. The President has set out in his message very fully and elaborately the reasons which prompted him to veto this provision. He has insisted, and in my judgment he has good reason to insist, that when you undertake to say, not that Congress but a joint committee of Congress, shall have the power to absolutely censor all of the publications of the executive branch of this Government, have the power to go into the department and into the independent establishments, and censor what they issue, what they send out to the country, it is a clear, plain encroachment upon the functions of the executive branch of the Government.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman was a member of the conference committee, was he not?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. No; I was not.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Did any gentleman on the gentleman's side who was a member of the conference object to this provision?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Not that I know of. It was a unanimous conference report, but it was a Senate amendment. The provision never did come directly before the House. The House never had an opportunity to pass upon it or consider it, and I dare say that there were very few Members of Congress who knew it was in the bill by way of Senate amendment.

Mr. BARKLEY. Aside from the question of these publications that are issued by the various departments, does the gentleman propose to discuss the effect this amendment would have upon the phase of it relating to copying, multigraphing, and so forth?

Mr. KNUTSON. And will the gentleman also touch upon the effect that the passage of this bill over the President's veto would have on the paper situation?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will try to come to that.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Also in regard to this immense amount of press-agent stuff put out every night?

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will.

Mr. TOWNER. I was going to ask the gentleman if the same reason and principle would not apply to the bill of a year ago that applies now—that it is a usurpation of the Executive authority? I was wondering why the President did not veto that bill but vetoes this.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I tried to give my own views in regard to that matter a moment ago. To repeat, very briefly, I will say to the gentleman from Iowa that the provision adopted a year ago is entirely different from the provision that is carried in this particular bill, in that the provision adopted a year ago provided that upon the adjournment of the next regular session of Congress no publication of any kind—bulletin, magazines, or periodicals—should be printed and issued without specific authority of law. But in order to give this Congress at this regular session the time in which to formulate legislation and to determine just what magazines and periodicals and bulletins should be published and issued, it was provided that the Joint Committee on Printing should have authority in the interim to say whether or not a particular magazine or periodical should be issued. It was a temporary measure, looking to the enactment of proper remedial legislation. Now, the gentleman will see clearly, I am sure, that that is an entirely different proposition from the one that is presented now, which proposes to make permanent law the right of the Joint Committee on Printing to absolutely dictate to the executive branches of this Government, and to censor, if it desires to do so, any magazine, publication, or periodical that may be issued by it.

Mr. TOWNER. I certainly understand the gentleman's distinction, which he has made clear; but that is not the proposition that I asked the gentleman to give his attention to. The proposition is that while this is contended to be an encroachment upon the executive branch of the Government, to that extent the gentleman states the other was also an encroachment on the Executive power, and the principle involved is exactly the same. I was wondering if the gentleman could tell us why the President did not veto that a year ago if it was an encroachment on his power?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I do not think anyone would seriously contend that Congress, which has authority to make appropriations and has full control of the purse strings, would not have the authority to say of itself how that money should be expended, whether for a particular magazine or another.

But Congress in this case is undertaking to delegate such authority as it might have as a Congress to a joint committee composed of four or five Senators and Representatives and giving to them the authority which it ought to exercise itself and which it was contemplated it would exercise when that law was passed.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. TOWNER. Again, let me suggest to the gentleman that the same principle would apply to the bill a year ago that applies now.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I do not agree with the gentleman that the cases are on all fours with each other.

Now, the President set forth very much more clearly than I possibly can his reason for presenting this veto, and I want to read you a portion of what he had to say upon the subject. He said:

> Aside from the control over the printing, issuing, or discontinuing of periodicals or similar Government publications by the Congressional Joint Committee on Printing, the obvious effect of this provision would be to give to that committee power to prevent the executive departments from mimeographing, multigraphing, or otherwise duplicating any material which they desire, and, in that way, power to determine what information shall be given to the people of the country by the executive departments. The committee apparently would have power, for example, to prevent even the making of carbon copies of anything other than official correspondence and office records. Without raising any constitutional question, I think that this section, which would give the Congressional Joint Committee on Printing power to exercise censorship over the executive departments, is an encroachment on the functions of the Executive and incompatible with good government. I am in entire sympathy with the efforts of the Congress and the departments to effect economies in printing and in the use of paper and supplies, but I do not believe that such a provision as this should become law. I should also call attention to the fact that by its terms the section in question absolutely forbids mimeographing, multigraphing, and other duplicating processes in the executive departments (except as permitted by regulations established by the Congressional Joint Committee on Printing) and thus imposes a flat prohibition against the exercise of executive functions.

And, answering the inquiry of the gentleman from Iowa, he goes on to say:

> In considering bills containing the provisions mentioned above, I was willing to overlook the objectionable features for the time being with the thought that they were designed as exceptional and temporary measures to meet unusual conditions. To permit such expedients to serve as precedents or accepted rules for legislation would, in my judgment, be most unfortunate and destructive of proper principles for the orderly and efficient management of the Government's business. I feel very strongly that the authority carried in section 8 of the bill herewith returned should not be conferred upon a legislative committee and that the entire section should be stricken from the measure.

So I suggest to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] that this provision goes much further than the provision adopted a year ago, because, as the President well said, it would very likely prevent the executive departments from doing anything more than the making of carbon copies of official correspondence and office records in the bureaus, and would permit a joint committee of Congress, after an appropriation was made, to say to the executive branch of the Government just what publications should be made and just what they should contain by denying the right to publish any document which does not happen to suit its views. And certainly it seems to me that the Executive was well within his constitutional prerogatives and within his right in asking that Congress should not seek in this way to encroach upon the functions of the Executive.

Now, I will tell you what, in my opinion, ought to be done. I think this veto ought to be sustained; but no one who knows the facts will deny that there is the gravest sort of abuse in connection with the publications of our Government, and the action a year ago and the action of the committee, in so far as this provision is concerned, was taken because of that great abuse and the great waste of money in sending out such a mass of material of no real value and frequently to people who are not interested in it. It is a great waste of paper, but I think we ought to sustain the veto of the President. Then I think that this bill ought to be sent back to the Committee on Appropriations and let that committee get together and frame a provision which will meet the exigencies of the case and which will cut out a large part, if not all, of this great duplication and waste. And that can be done in this way: A commission can be created consisting of two or three members of the Cabinet, if you please—say, the Secretary of the Treasury and the Postmaster General and the Attorney General—and let that commission be substituted for the Joint Committee on Printing, so that no new issues, no new publications or magazines, can be issued without their approval.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. CALDWELL. I want to ask the gentleman how the committee was divided on this question—whether or not the committee was a unit on reporting this resolution, or whether some of its members favored reporting the bill over again? How did the committee divide on that proposition?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. There was a division in the committee.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I will say to the gentleman that the Joint Committee on Printing did ask the Cabinet officers to name what publications they wanted to be issued, and even after the Cabinet officers had named what publications they wanted to be issued the committee found it was almost impossible to make anybody who does any printing, bureau chief or otherwise, let go at all.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. But, after all, the Joint Committee on Printing would have the power under this bill to veto what is purely an executive function of the Government.

This is not a partisan matter, because it is a matter that involves next year and all years to come until Congress takes affirmative action to the contrary. But I say again that it is not good policy for Congress to undertake to act in a matter of this kind through one of its committees. I am not making an attack on the members of this Joint Committee on Printing. It is composed of most reputable and able Members of the House and Senate. But it is not good policy for Congress to give the power to one of its committees to go down to the departments and say to them, "Now, if you will change this publication as we want you to change it, and cut out here and put in there, we will permit you to send it out; but we propose to stand here and censor that publication, and if it does not conform to our views we do not propose to permit you to place it before the American people."

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time. [Applause.]

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to a question before he leaves the floor?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. HOWARD. Do you think this extravagance in printing is confined to the executive departments?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. By no means. I think we might well clean our own skirts up here on the question of extravagance in printing.

Mr. HOWARD. Does the gentleman know that to-day the presses of the Government Printing Office are running almost all night and day printing envelopes to be sent out that are costing this Government $4.50 a thousand?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I do not doubt that the gentleman is correct. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, this question goes to the very core of our parliamentary institutions. In essence it involves the greatest question that has come before this Congress. At the beginning parliaments sprang out of a bargain between the commons and the king. Under the Tudors the commons lost influence, and then under James I and Charles I began the great contest out of which came the control of a people by itself.

The question here, of whether the people can attach conditions to their grants of money, was the very center of the battles fought not only in Westminster, but on the fields of Naseby and Marston Moor. This question cost Charles I his head. It was settled for England by the Bill of Rights, and then it was transferred to this country.

In the Province out of which my own State sprang, this very question for two generations was constantly at issue between the general court and the governors. The general court insisted on the right to audit the accounts of the governors. It went even further and stipulated that the general court might direct the expenditure of money appropriated for the use of the speaker. Out of this controversy, in no small part, grew the Revolutionary War.

When our constitutions were written the Montesquieu doctrine had come to public notice, and there followed with us that attempt at separation of powers which should leave sharp lines of demarcation between the executive, the legislative, and the judicial. Notably the great Democratic Presidents have been those who have most overstepped the bounds between the departments of Government.

I want to call your attention to the fact that the present occupant of the Executive Mansion, soon after his elecion but before his inauguration, delivered himself of this pronouncement:

He—

The President—

must be prime minister, as much concerned with the guidance of legislation as with the just and orderly execution of law.

He came into office announcing that he conceived it to be his duty to be concerned with the guidance of legislation. From that day to this he has overstepped at every possible opportunity he could find the line between the executive and the legislative.

Two wrongs do not make one right. We may not on our part overstep these bounds. We may not wisely thereby approve his policy, a policy proclaimed by him as a writer on political science for more than 30 years, a policy that strangely Providence gave him the power to put into effect. We may not imitate him in transgressing the spirit of the Constitution; but we may recall that our Constitution was written and our Government founded upon the principle so dear to the hearts of Englishmen, among the greatest of democratic principles, the right that we have to demand redress of grievances before supply. That is the very center of all the proceedings of Parliament. That was the basis of our own parliamentary institutions.

We have the right to demand redress of grievances before supply. We have the right to direct how our money shall be spent. We have the right to go to the full extreme that the President in his message indicates would be so audacious. Not one dollar may the executive departments use contrary to our direction, contrary to our law. Even if we should see fit to go to such an extreme as to impose a censorship, that would be no more than exercise of the birthright of men who belong to the English-speaking race. It is a right which we would give up our lives rather than sacrifice, because it is the right upon which the Republic itself rests, the right to say to those who are to enforce the law what the law shall be. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman from Tennessee use some of his time? I have only one more speech.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I am going to use what little time I have left.

Mr. GOOD. There will be but one speech on this side.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I understand that, but I submit to the gentleman in all fairness that I have used 25 minutes practically, or 26 minutes. How much time have I used, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has four minutes remaining.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I have used 26 minutes, and the gentleman has used only 10 minutes. I think the gentleman should use some of his time.

Mr. GOOD. I expect to make but one speech, and I expect to close, being the mover of the question, as is the custom of the House. I will ask the gentleman, following the customary practice, to use the balance of his time.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I think the gentleman should at least use a portion of his time now. The gentleman from Iowa has made no speech, and there has been no speech made dealing with some of the questions which he will probably raise, and yet the gentleman desires to reserve all of his time and to make the closing speech, permitting no reply whatever.

Mr. GOOD. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] has practically made my speech.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman from Mississippi made a very able speech, as he always does, but he did not touch some of the questions which I feel sure the gentleman intends to discuss.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee had the right to use his whole 30 minutes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. After the gentleman from Iowa concludes his speech, will I be permitted to use the four minutes that I have remaining?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the rule of the House is that the one who controls the time has the right to close; the rule is that when there is but one speech left on the side of the one who has control, the other side must use all of its time first. Does not the gentleman from Tennessee recognize that as the regular rule?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I know that never before, at least to my knowledge, has the mover of a motion with 20 minutes at his disposal, and who expects to make an argument, refused to disclose his hand or state the grounds on which he bases his motion in order that the other side may have a fair opportunity to answer such argument as he may present. [Applause.] And I submit that there is no rule, but simply a custom, and it is a question that must appeal to the fairness of a Member as to how he shall treat those who differ with him in such circumstances.

The gentleman from Iowa will undoubtedly say that the President will be responsible if this provision goes out of the bill, because on July 1, unless some legislation is adopted in the meantime, there will be no authority whereby a magazine or a periodical of the country can be printed. I want to say to you gentlemen on the majority side of this House that you will be responsible if such a result obtains, because you have had more than one year to enact legislation which would give authority for the publication of those periodicals and bulletins in which the people of this country are interested. This, I repeat, is but another evidence of the failure of this Congress to take up important legislative matters during the time it has been in session for more than a year and pass on them in the interest of the people.

The President of the United States has told you in his message that this provision, in his opinion, is an encroachment upon the executive branch of the Government. I do not think any fair-minded man who will look at it in a nonpartisan and fair way will fail to agree with him on that point. I have suggested to you a remedy, or a provision that can be adopted, which will save duplication and which will bring about economy. That is the creation of a commission to pass on these publications as they are issued and cut out duplication, and that commission can be formed without $1 of expense to the Government.

The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] has said that Congress should have and does have the right to limit its appropriations and keep its hands on the appropriations made by it. Nobody disputes that proposition. Congress has the right to make an appropriation for publications in just such amount as it desires and to limit the appropriations to the publication of just such documents as it may prescribe, but after it makes that appropriation I deny the right of Congress, acting through a joint committee, to go down to the departments and say to them, "We will censor what you undertake to print; we do not like this paragraph; we do not like this particular clause; we are not in sympathy with the views expressed; cut them out or change them and you shall have our O. K.; but if you insist on keeping that paragraph in then we do not propose to give you authority to issue that publication." [Applause.] Clearly under this provision the committee could take that position if it was so disposed.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I feel that the membership of the House should approach this question without any spirit of partisanship. It is a business proposition, pure and simple, involving as it does the expenditure of hundreds of thousands of dollars a year. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] who has just taken his seat complains rather bitterly because this provision that brought forth the President's veto finds a place in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill. I want to remind the gentleman from Tennessee that the section to which the President has called attention, and to which he objects, is not as drastic as section 11, found in the present law that was approved by the President on March 1, 1919. That measure was reported to this House by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS], who has just taken his seat. What does that act contain? Section 11 contains this proviso, and if you will refer to the President's veto you will see that it was the first proviso in section 11 of that act, the act that he approved, which the present bill attempts to amend. That proviso is as follows:

Provided, That hereafter no journal, magazine, periodical, or other similar publication, shall be printed and issued by any branch or officer of the Government service unless the same shall have been specifically authorized by Congress, but such publications as are now being printed without specific authority from Congress may, in the discretion of the Joint Committee on Printing, be continued until the close of the next regular session of Congress, when, if authority for their continuance is not then granted by Congress, they shall not thereafter be printed.

That law is now on the statute books, and was reported by the gentleman from Tennessee and is permanent law. You will observe that it is provided that "hereafter" those publications should not be printed at all, so in that respect this bill does not enlarge existing law. The provision in the bill that has been vetoed provides as follows:

Provided, That hereafter no journal, magazine, periodical, or similar Government publication, shall be printed, issued, or discontinued by any branch or officer of the Government service unless the same shall have been authorized under such regulations as shall be prescribed by the Joint Committee on Printing, and such publications shall not contain any commercial advertisements.

A Committee on Printing was established back in 1846, composed of three Members of the Senate and three Members of the House. In 1852 there was established a Joint Committee on Printing, composed of three Members of the House and three Members of the Senate. That joint committee has existed ever since. When the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] brought his bill in a year ago, the act the President approved, he said by that bill, and the President said by that approval, that 266 publications not authorized by law could not be printed during this session of Congress unless the Joint Committee on Printing should so direct.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman will remember that it was a Senate amendment a year ago, just as it was this time.

Mr. GOOD. Certainly; and the gentleman accepted it and the President approved it. There were 266 of those publications. This great committee of the two Houses, composed of Republicans and Democrats alike, have done what? They have eliminated 111 of these publications, and there is not a newspaper published in any congressional district in the United States but applauds their act in trying to cut out this useless extravagance and useless waste of paper. [Applause.] One hundred and eleven of those publications have ceased to be printed, and I wonder if that is what the President refers to when he says in his message:

I regard the proviso in question as an invasion of the province of the Executive, and calculated to result in unwarranted interference in the processes of good government, producing confusion, irritation, and distrust.

Yes; it did produce distrust when the Joint Committee on Printing cut out 111 useless publications. No one has heard from a single constituent with regard to that loss. What does this provision that the President refers to do? It simply permits 155 publications, that will have to stop when this session of Congress ends, unless you give somebody somewhere authority to pass on them and permit them to continue. The gentleman from Tennessee says we should give to a commission the power to determine the question of their continuance. The President says, "Keep your hands off." Whom will we follow? Does the gentleman distrust the Members of this body or the Members of the Senate who compose this great Joint Committee on Printing? They have done good work. The public approves it. The only person in the United States that I have heard of who complains about it is the President of the United States. If any bill should have been vetoed as an unwarranted interference by the Congress with the executive departments, it was the bill reported by the gentleman from Tennessee that carried this provision originally. And that was approved by the President. This bill simply permits the present order of things to continue during the next year. That is all.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. For a brief question.

Mr. SABATH. The gentleman has omitted—I do not know whether willfully or not—to read the proviso in the amendment.

Mr. GOOD. Oh, no, I have not. I am coming to that. The gentleman suggests that there is another item in this amendment which provides that they can not use duplicating machines in doing this work. Let me say to you that there is not a bank in the United States, not a newspaper in the United States, that had been receiving the daily statement from the Secretary of the Treasury that did not receive during the past month a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury to the effect that the daily statement was not printed because Congress had not provided the funds. The Congress provided for those funds. They were used in part in sending out just such publications. I have here a publication put out by a duplicating machine, a letter by a national bank examiner, sent out under the frank of the Comptroller of the Currency, with a publication of the kind that Congress will not permit, with extensive graphic illustrations and the money appropriated for printing in the Treasury Department was used in part in publishing such useless publications, which was simply to explain the annual report of the Comptroller of the Currency. No one can read this mimeographed copy sent out by the comptroller and approve of the expense involved. It performs no useful purpose, but it helped deplete the appropriation and make a deficiency appropriation necessary. A great deal has been expended uselessly in using duplicating machines to get around the decision of the Joint Committee on Printing and send out propaganda. Vote to sustain the veto message that was written by somebody who does not apparently understand the provisions of the present law, and you cut off the right to print these publications. You prevent the publication of the Crop Reporter—183,000 copies annually—the sending throughout the country of the agricultural statistics. It will prevent the sending out of 7,000 copies of the Experimental Station Reporter; it will prevent the sending out of the Market Reporter, 30,000 copies; it will prevent the sending out the weather reports and some valuable publications.

Mr. CALDWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. I do not yield. It will prevent the sending out of publications of this kind, and, remember this, that when the last Congress, a Democratic House and a Democratic Senate, functioned upon this very subject it said that these publications should not hereafter be published at all, but during the present Congress they might be sent out only to the extent the Joint Committee on Printing would approve. When did your Joint Committee on Printing come in such disfavor? When the last Congress was looking for a commission to pass on this subject, when the last Congress was trying to solve this question, it said that the Joint Committee on Printing had the confidence and respect of the membership of both Houses and of the country, and should pass upon this question. Now, the gentleman from Tennessee says, "Oh, this Congress has been doing nothing; it has not passed legislation." Why did not the last Congress and the Congress before that, which saw millions of dollars expended in this way—why did not that Congress settle the question? It thought that the settlement ought to be to give the Joint Committee on Printing jurisdiction over the subject matter, but now that somebody has called the attention of the President to the item in the pending bill without calling his attention to existing law, which he approved, the gentleman now objects to the provision of the present law that a year ago he asked the House to adopt.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. If the gentleman will yield, the last Congress did function on March 1, 1919, and gave the Joint Committee on Printing only during this session of Congress the right to pass upon the question as to what publications should be made, expecting this Congress to legislate upon the subject.

Mr. CANNON. Can the gentleman prove that?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I can prove it from the very letter of the law, I will say to the gentleman from Illinois, because certainly the last Congress did not expect these publications should absolutely cease at the end of this session.

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman will allow me, while he was making a law and had charge of it, why did not he make it extend further?

Mr. GOOD. Oh, gentlemen, that is a poor excuse. Read the language of the gentleman's bill; read the language of the great bill reported to this House by the gentleman from Tennessee in that regard and measure the words:

That hereafter no journal, magazine, publication, periodical, or similar publication shall be printed and issued by any branch or officer of the Government unless the same shall have been specifically authorized by Congress.

A clear recognition——

Mr. GRIFFIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. I can not yield—a clear recognition of the terrible waste of the administration in the publication of these various periodicals and magazines. That committee and that Congress recognized the terrible extravagance and waste of the people's money in printing these publications. It recognized they were useless, and then it said—as strong as language can say it—that these unauthorized publications shall not be printed at all, except that during the next Congress, if the Joint Committee on Printing finds any merit in any of them, they can permit them during that session alone, and after that they shall not be printed at all. Now, the joint committee of the present Congress felt that some of these publications that had some merit should continue, and so they were simply extended for the next year, under the discretion which the last Congress lodged in this Joint Committee on Printing. Now, what will be the result if we fail to pass this bill? I want that side of the House to understand what it means to vote to support the President's veto. If that side of the House votes to support the President's veto, you will have the bill back, in my opinion, eliminating the objectionable section entirely, and then we will have in full force and effect all the provisions of the gentleman's bill, and that is that these publications will die just as the gentleman's bill provided they should die—at the end of this Congress. [Applause.]

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield? The gentleman and his party is in control of the House. Why did not you bring in a provision making possible the publication——

Mr. GOOD. We did bring in a bill. We brought in a bill simply to extend the power the gentleman's law gave—the very idea that the gentleman's law carried out—but because the President objected to it seems to be sufficient reason why practically every Member on that side shall yield their personality, yield their judgment, and vote to sustain the President, when we all know that the provision carried in the bill is a sensible and businesslike proposition and ought to be enacted into law. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote.

The SPEAKER. Under the agreement the previous question is ordered, and the question is, Will the House on reconsideration pass the bill, the objections of the President to the contrary notwithstanding, and on this there is a yea and nay vote.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 170, nays 127, not voting 130, as follows:

During the reading the following occurred:

The SPEAKER. The Chair will call the attention of the gentleman from Illinois that on page 42, line 4, there seems to be a word lacking, giving the number of the regiment.

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. I ask unanimous consent that we may return to that paragraph.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to return to the paragraph mentioned at the completion of the reading of the bill. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend, on page 42, line 4, pension of Abbie J. Geuthner, by striking out "Battery 3" and inserting in lieu thereof "Third Battery Maine Light Artillery," so that it will read, in lines 4 and 5:

Late of the Third Battery Maine Light Artillery.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. FULLER of Illinois: Page 42, line 4, strike out "Battery 3, Regiment Maine Volunteer," and insert in lieu thereof the words "the Third Battery Maine Light Artillery."

Mr. CANNON. Will my friend allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. I am always for the bills the gentleman's committee reports, but does not the general legislation do better by these people than the special bill?

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. This bill is supposed to include only those that are not covered by the general bill that became a law on the 1st day of May.

Mr. CANNON. Are there many exceptions?

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. There are quite a number that are not covered.

Mr. CANNON. And as to those who would get more under the general law, they could not get this in addition?

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. We have undertaken to strike out the names of those who will get an increase under the general law that we passed recently and which became the law on the 1st day of May.

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Speaker, on page 34, line 10, there is a pension allowed to Thomas B. McClane of $30 per month. Thomas B. McClane at the present time is on the pension roll and is a veteran of the Civil War. The general bill which we passed had a provision in it in which it said that all those upon the roll at that time as veterans of the Civil War should have a pension of $50 a month.

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. This should be stricken out then.

Mr. CANDLER. He is already on the roll at the present time.

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend, on page 34——

The SPEAKER. The other amendment is not yet agreed to. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, I would like to discuss the first amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] is recognized.

Mr. WALSH. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois if he is sure that in the Pension Bureau there has been any official recognition given to such an organization as the Third Battery of Maine Light Artillery? There may have been more than one regiment having three batteries of light artillery.

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. That is the description given in the proof before the committee, and the examiner is supposed to examine the files from the Pension Bureau, and I presume that designation in the report is given correctly.

Mr. WALSH. How does it then appear so in the bill?

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. That is evidently a misprint.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman is sure that this will give rise to no complication? It is not customary to so describe it.

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. I suppose from the report of the examiner that he gave the correct designation.

Mr. WALSH. It is rather an unusual designation.

Mr. CANDLER. I want to ask the gentleman from Illinois another question: I think under the general bill the case of Thomas B. McClane would be covered. There may be some question about it. He was on the rolls under a special bill passed by Congress that placed him on the roll.

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. There is no question but that, under the ruling of the Pension Bureau, if he is on the rolls he is covered by the general bill.

Mr. CANDLER. He is on the rolls at the present time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois wish to return to page 34?

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to return to page 34 to offer an amendment. Is there any objection to returning?

There was no objection.

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, the motion is to strike out, on page 34, lines 10, 11, 12, and 13.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FULLER of Illinois: On page 34, strike out lines 10 to 13, inclusive.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill as amended.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. FULLER of Illinois, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ARMY TENTS FOR STATE ENCAMPMENT, BLOOMINGTON, IND.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House joint resolution 354.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of House joint resolution 354, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 354) authorizing the Secretary of War to loan to Paul E. Slocumb Post, No. 85, Grand Army of the Republic, Bloomington, Ind., necessary tents, cots, mattresses, pillows, and blankets for use at the State encampment to be held at said city May 25, 26, and 27, 1920.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GARD. What is the post that the gentleman refers to?

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. That is the Grand Army Post of Bloomington, Ind.

Mr. GARD. It is for an encampment of the Grand Army of the State of Indiana?

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I do not know what are the provisions of this bill, and whether the Treasury is guarded, as is usual in bills of this character. I would like to know the nature of it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I have examined this bill, and I find it saves the Government from any expense whatever.

Mr. GARNER. Very well.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the joint resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to loan, in his discretion, to the Paul E. Slocumb Post, No. 85, Grand Army of the Republic, Bloomington, in the State encampment to be held at Bloomington, Ind., May 25, 26, and 27, 1920, the necessary tents, cots, mattresses, pillows, and blankets, as may be agreed upon by said post and the War Department: Provided, That no expense shall be caused the United States Government by the delivery and return of said property, the same to be delivered to the commander of said Paul E. Slocumb Post at such time as may be agreed upon by the Secretary of War and the commander of said post: Provided further, That the Secretary of War, before delivering said equipment, shall take from the commander of said post a good and sufficient security for the safe return of said property in good order and condition, and the whole to be without expense to the United States Government.

With a committee amendment, as follows:

On page 1, line 8, strike out the words "mattresses, pillows."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the resolution as amended.

The joint resolution as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the title will be amended to accord with the text.

There was no objection.

On motion of Mr. BLAND of Indiana, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the resolution was passed was laid on the table.

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR APPROPRIATION BILL—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. PORTER, by direction of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported for printing, under the rule, the conference report and statement on the bill (H. R. 11960) making appropriations for the Diplomatic and Consular Service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Dudley, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 11927) to increase the efficiency of the personnel of the Navy and Coast Guard through the temporary provision of bonuses or increased compensation.

SECTION 32 OF THE FARM LOAN ACT.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I present a privileged report from the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas submits a privileged resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Rules, to which was referred House resolution 553, providing for the consideration of House joint resolution 351, having considered the same, beg to report in lieu thereof the following substitute and recommend that it be adopted:

"Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of House joint resolution 351, extending the provisions of the act amending section 32 of the Federal farm loan act to June 30, 1921; that there shall be not to exceed one hour's debate, one-half of the time to be controlled by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT] and one-half by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PHELAN]; that at the conclusion of the general debate the joint resolution shall be read for amendment under the five-minute rule, and at the conclusion of such reading the committee shall rise and report the joint resolution to the House, together with amendments, if any, whereupon the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the joint resolution and all amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit."

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the resolution be amended so that the name of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] be substituted for that of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PHELAN] in the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to substitute the name of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] for that of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PHELAN]. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, does this take care of anybody who is opposed to the resolution, if there is opposition to it?

Mr. WINGO. There will not be any trouble about that. One gentleman wants to offer an amendment, but we will be in Committee of the Whole, and there will be no effort to cut off that gentleman.

Mr. WALSH. In offering the amendment there could not be any way to cut him off, but suppose the gentleman needed time in general debate?

Mr. WINGO. There will be no question about that. There is one gentleman who has been given the assurance that he will be cared for.

Mr. MADDEN. There may be others. I want to reserve the right to object, because I am not at all sure that I am going to be for this resolution, or for the bill when it is reported.

Mr. WINGO. If it is going to take up any time, I suggest to the gentleman that he withdraw his request.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I withdraw my request in order to save time.

Mr. MADDEN. Reserving the right to object——

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. There is nothing to object to. I withdraw the request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas is recognized.

Mr. MADDEN. But if I may be permitted——

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Does the gentleman want some time on the rule?

Mr. MADDEN. No; I just want to ask a question.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. All right.

Mr. MADDEN. I want to know whether all the time is going to be allotted to those in favor of the bill when the bill is up for consideration, or whether those who may be opposed to it are going to have any consideration whatever. This seems to allot the time to those who are in favor of the bill and to take no account of those who are opposed to it.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The report that came to the Committee on Rules was that the bill was unanimously reported from the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. MADDEN. But that does not bind other Members of the House.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. And the resolution was unanimously reported by the Committee on Rules. One Member of the House has indicated a desire to offer an amendment, and he is protected under the rule.

Mr. MADDEN. There may be others.

Mr. KING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. KING. I do not know whether I caught the full import of this, but it seems as though the Committee on Banking and Currency—without criticizing those gentlemen—are frequently before the Rules Committee asking for rules, and when they do get a rule it always divides the time among those who favor the proposition. So far as I am concerned, I am for the proposition contained in this joint resolution and voted for it, but I know that there are Members in this House who probably will want to question the advisability of passing this resolution. Many of them have spoken to me, and they may want time. It seems to me that it is a bad practice to bring in a resolution limiting the discussion to the affirmative side of a bill.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. This does not limit the discussion to the affirmative side of the bill. The rule makes no provision whatever for that, and the practice of the House has always been to divide the time between those for and those against the proposition.

Mr. KING. Both the gentlemen who are to monopolize the control of the time under this resolution are for the joint resolution.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Is the gentleman for or against the joint resolution?

Mr. KING. I am for it.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That is what everybody says. Then why this talk? Everybody is for the joint resolution. Why raise a moot question on a matter of this kind?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, this kind of a squabble comes up nearly every time that we have a bill up and try to divide the time. The gentleman from Arkansas, I know, will be perfectly willing to give some of his time to gentlemen opposed to the bill. Now, I want to ask the chairman, does this rule provide for amendment?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. It does.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I am glad to say that the Committee on Rules is improving.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I do not recollect of bringing in a rule for a long time that prohibited amendment. This rule provides for amendment.

Mr. CANNON. Is it to be considered in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. And the five-minute rule will prevail?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes; the five-minute rule will prevail. Now, Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS].

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, when this measure was up before the House in 1918 I voted against it. I interrupted Mr. GLASS, who had charge of it, to ask him whether he was in favor of this sort of legislation and he said he was not except in an emergency. I asked him whether he expected that this would become permanent after the emergency had passed and we would be called upon to continue it. He said no, that would not be the case.

This resolution now before the House is on its face not to make it permanent, since it is still considered as an emergency and is to carry the emergency until the clarification by the Supreme Court decision has been made. Consequently I am still in the same position I was in when it was up before.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. MORGAN. As I understand, this only carries the emergency until the 1st of next March.

Mr. FESS. That is all.

Mr. MORGAN. I thought the gentleman said until the emergency passes.

Mr. FESS. It is still an emergency measure and not permanent law. I did not resist it in the Committee on Rules because it had been recommended and represented by those who appeared as being necessary, owing to the court decision which can not come in the immediate future.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Is it not a fact that the Treasury already has $136,000,000 in these bonds which they have purchased?

Mr. FESS. I understand that is the case.

Mr. MADDEN. And notwithstanding the advance information they had as to what the Supreme Court is to do, they still incur obligations that create this condition.

Mr. FESS. Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to call the attention of the Members of Congress to the policy of the Federal Reserve Board. I want the attention of Members of the House, as I regard this quite a serious situation too often overlooked by the country. We passed the Federal reserve act for which I voted in 1913, but at the time there were certain fears that we entertained which we thought might materialize. One of the fears was the inflation that was made possible in the system. Some of us called attention to that feature. They claimed that the inflation would be saved by virtue of the requirements of the reserve which was fixed in gold and in sufficient amount to guard against undue expansion. Twice since the war began we have amended this bill making greater freedom in the use of the reserve, cutting down the amount necessary, until it permits a paper basis which is already dangerously close to realization.

I have noticed that there has been a gradual reduction of the reserve requirement in the administration of the law, and if you note these figures from the central reserve city banks you will see what that reduction has been. The reduction has been from 25 per cent to 4.18 per cent in the central reserve city banks, and from 15.6 to 3.34 in the reserve city banks, and from 7.4 to 2.5 in the country banks. That is a gradual reduction under the operation of the amendment of the reserve requirement which is significant of the dangers of inflation and loss of purchasing power.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman is talking about one set of banks and we are legislating for another.

Mr. FESS. I am talking about what the requirements of the Federal Reserve System permits and the actual practice. There has been an enlarged capacity under the administration of the law for the expansion of credit, and this country, under the stress of war, always suggesting inflation of the credit system, has kept pace with the countries of Europe on the expansion of credit. Let me cite you some figures: The cash reserve has declined from 1913 to 1920 over 40 per cent. The reserve notes which have taken place of the circulating medium, much of it either coin, metal, or its equivalent, have increased in a tremendous volume.

Let me give you briefly the figures of the Treasury: For example, take the gold certificate. In 1913 the amount was $994,000,000, or 29.7 per cent of our circulation. The amount in 1920, March 1, was $387,000,000, or 6½ per cent, less than a fourth of what it was seven years ago.

Silver certificates from $461,000,000, which is 13.8 per cent, to $128,000,000, which is but 2.1 per cent.

United States notes or greenbacks from $339,000,000 in 1913 to $328,000,000 in 1920. National-bank notes, from $711,000,000, which is 21.3 per cent, to $657,000,000, which is 11 per cent. Federal Reserve notes, in 1913, nothing, naturally, but in March, 1920, $2,999,700,000, or 50 per cent. On the first of this present month it was $3,065,935,013. Take the total circulation in 1913, and it amounted to $3,343,000,000, while in March of this year the total circulation was $5,999,000,000, which would be a per capita circulation, if you count 100,000,000 population, of something like $59, while prior to the war, in 1913, when we adopted the reserve system, it was but $34. The stock of money amounts to $7,755,953,906, or about $77 per capita. Note again the gold-reserve problem. Owing to the balance of trade prior to our entering the war being in our favor by many billions, we had an increase of gold shipments from Europe of over $1,109,000,000, making the largest collection of gold of any country on earth, which amounted in all to over $3,000,000,000. The increase was from our fund of $1,887,000,000 to $3,089,000,000. With that amount of gold here, a great proportion of it brought here during the war and kept here under an embargo in order to prevent its flowing back to Europe, we have enormously increased our reserve possibilities, which have stimulated the board to enlarge our circulation of Federal reserve notes until we have a paper circulation of over $30 per capita if we call our population 100,000,000. This gold fund is bound to be depleted, and I want to know what is to be the outcome of the reserve upon which this tremendously expanded paper money has been issued here in our own Government. We can not definitely insure against the inevitable depletion. Our stock of gold of $3,080,000,000 at the time of the armistice decreased to $2,721,000,000 by March 1, 1920.

We can not hope to hold this stock upon which this vast circulation has been constructed. With the loss of gold in the process of trade, what will be the effect upon the stupendous circulation? If not reduced, the gold standard is gone; if reduced, it must be in obedience to the demands of contraction, which is always a delicate problem.

During the war the necessity of floating billions of Government obligations, such as bonds, invited, if not demanded, a campaign of Government borrowing, in which the entire Nation joined. The whole country became a loaning propaganda. Patriotism was appealed to, loyalty was enlisted, and every passion was resorted to for the sale of bonds. They were presented as the very best securities upon the basis of profitable investment. The buyer was induced to go to the bank, borrow the money with which to buy bonds as a national duty. The banks were expected to loan the money at the rate allowed on the bonds. Consequently, the country, or a good part of its people, instead of purchasing out of its savings, to deposit again as an investment to be held for future reward, went to the banks, borrowed the funds, purchased the bonds, which were deposited with the banks as collateral security.

The banks could afford to do it if the Government allowed the money represented by the bonds to remain with the bank at a small rate of interest, which was done in many cases.

A procedure was allowed which served as a basis for issuing reserve notes released against the bonds held by the banks. The amendments to the act to reduce the reserve requirements were asked and granted in order to carry out this process. It will be seen that this procedure did not invite the buyer to take up his note to the bank, which operated as so much inflation. There was no inducement to save, but rather an invitation to continue expenditure until the country has entered upon a scale of extravagance never before experienced. We are plunging along totally unaware that the day of settlement must come in time. This policy can have but one effect, namely, an upward tendency of the price current. It is not an increase of value, but rather an increase of price. The very virtue of the Federal Reserve System is its greatest danger. It readily responds to the demands of expansion, but it will not respond to the requirement of contraction. We boast that there can be no money crisis under the Reserve System. That is based upon the statement that when money becomes tight we expand to the point of a liquefying of all our industrial wealth. In other words, the country's wealth may be put in circulation in the form of reserve notes, to be retired when the crisis is past.

We have noted the increase, but no decrease. Expansion is easy, contraction dangerous. Inflation comes without effort, deflation is the problem. The true measure of the necessity of increased circulation is the increase of business from 1914 to 1919. That increase for the country, measured in currency, was about 20 per cent, but, measured by bushels, yards, pounds, and so forth, it is only 10 per cent.

The latter would be a measure of the necessity of note increase. Instead of that we have an increase of 71 per cent, or seven times the real measure.

The inevitable result of this policy is the loss of purchasing power of our money. That is why we buy from 30 to 50 cents on the dollar. This has vastly increased the cost of war. All materials and labor must cost proportionately more. To-day the cost of government is four to five times what it was before the war. Labor demands higher wages to meet higher costs of living. If granted, the cost of living in that degree again goes up, and the wage earner gets more, but pays more and is not the gainer, while the salaried people, whose remuneration does not expand with the cost scale, find their salaries cut in two by virtue of the loss of purchasing power of an inflated measure of value.

The powers of the Federal Reserve Board are almost plenary over suspension of reserve requirements within a certain period of time, also to issue and retire reserve notes, also over suspension of any officer of the system, also over the rediscount of notes of reserve banks, to control the rates of discount, the power to control exchange, and to exercise general supervision over the banks within the system.

Hearings before the Rules Committee last week show the efforts to compel all banks to come within the system, where one group of men shall have complete power over the purse of the Nation. If this power should ever be abused, the fears of Jackson back in the thirties of the last century would be but a ripple compared with the current of fiscal power.

If prices are the result of control, the Federal Reserve Board has all the power men could demand. The men who are administering this law and who have permitted a policy of expansion until we are in danger of a paper basis must be sobered by the tremendous responsibility now upon them to take the proper steps to reach a normal status. Of all the explanations of the abnormal price current, the expanded credit due to the war and the expanded currency permitted by the Federal board has most to do with it.

Mr. Speaker, that is the explanation of your high cost level, and that is the greatest problem of the country to-day, and it is in the hands of the Federal Reserve Board, and it must be solved. Let us approach these emergency measures with caution. It is always dangerous to increase the ease for borrowing. Let us stimulate the habits of saving. Speculation is inviting, borrowing is common, but the best national trait, both for the individual and the Government, is produce and save. This is the real solution of our greatest problem.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU].

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO].

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] raises a very interesting question, but it has nothing to do with the pending legislation, and to that I desire first to direct my attention. I call attention first to the statement made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN]. He asks the question why it is that these banks and the Federal Land Bank Board, with the advance information as to what the Supreme Court was going to do, continued to incur obligations? That is an astounding question to ask. In the first place, neither the Federal Land Bank Board nor the Committee on Banking and Currency received any advance information from the Supreme Court, and it is the first intimation that I have had that the Supreme Court gave out any advance information to anyone.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. The Supreme Court did render a decision long enough ago to enable the land banks to trim their sails to meet the conditions instead of continuing to create obligations that make this legislation necessary.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman please tell me when the Supreme Court rendered that decision?

Mr. MADDEN. Whenever they rendered it; it is not so long ago.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman undertakes to speak about something on which he has no information. There has been no decision by the Supreme Court. I will call the attention of the House to the facts. As soon as the Federal farm-loan act was passed the private mortgage bankers of this country immediately had to reduce their rates about 1 per cent. That is conceded. They immediately started a campaign of misrepresentation and threatened to test the constitutionality of the act. They dragged the matter along, while the land banks prospered. Some time about a year ago they brought suit—a man did in Kansas City—to test the constitutionality of the act. After a very able argument, after full hearing, the Federal court at Kansas City upheld the constitutionality of the act upon every point that was challenged. Some of the ablest counsel in the United States appeared. Ex-Associate Justice Hughes at first rendered his opinion that the act was constitutional, and he is one of the attorneys who argued the case. Finally, the people who were attacking the act appealed to the Supreme Court of the United States, and Mr. Hughes and other able counsel appeared before the Supreme Court and upheld the decision of the Federal court at Kansas City in very able arguments. It dragged along in the Supreme Court for some time, but in the meantime the Federal land banks ceased doing business by not receiving new applications, but confined their operations to applications pending, though they felt sure the Supreme Court would affirm the decision of the lower court, and do so by the 1st of April.

Now, a few days ago the Supreme Court of the United States set the case down for reargument. That indicated that the court was equally divided, one member having been absent and not participating, and, as we know the Supreme Court is going to adjourn, the reargument can not be had until next fall. What happens? What is the situation sought to be met by this legislation in a practical way? Even though the banks stop operating they had a lot of business pending, they had loans to be completed, mortgages actually given prior to March 1, prior to the time we had any intimation the matter was being held up in the Supreme Court. As I say, mortgages were given and put upon record throughout the country by farmers who relied upon the decision of the lower court, upon the opinion of Mr. Hughes, and to-day they are without their money, although their mortgages are of record.

Mr. MADDEN. How much do they amount to—$8,000,000?

Mr. WINGO. I will tell the gentleman something else if he will wait.

Mr. MADDEN. I would like to hear it.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman says it amounts to $8,000,000. In addition, there were other commitments on loans closed amounting to several million dollars. In addition to those two classes, there is another class of commitments, illustrated by the methods of the bank doing business in Indiana and Ohio. Headed by a practical banker, instead of issuing bonds in advance of needs he arranged a line of credit with commercial banks in those States, on which it now owes $5,000,000 upon 60 and 90 day paper, and that paper is going to come due pretty soon, the money having been used to meet loans closed. Now, what do we do? We find the $35,000,000 or $40,000,000 will clean it all up, the commitments of the land banks made when they felt sure there would be no question but that the Supreme Court would uphold the lower court, and I deny the land banks have shown lack of business judgment. I deny that they went ahead and made loans and commitments as charged by the gentleman, but, as a matter of fact, they closed down, and every Member of this House, except the gentleman from Illinois, had protests for months from people in their districts against these land banks refusing any new business.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. WINGO. Yes; certainly.

Mr. MADDEN. Now, will the gentleman tell the House what justice there is in legislation that seeks to enable a banker in Indiana or any other State to pay a $5,000,000 obligation that they have created without any authority of law?

Mr. WINGO. For the same reason that the gentleman from Illinois has legislated here when we passed a bill that made it possible to take from the United States Treasury $3,000,000,000 to settle the informal war contracts, for which they had no legal obligation. Now it is for the same reason.

Mr. MADDEN. Well, I deny that statement.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman can not deny it; it is a matter of common knowledge. The gentleman himself and this Congress, under a moral obligation, without any legal obligation, passed the measure for the relief of informal war contracts under which $3,000,000 of claims are being adjusted, and millions have been allowed, including profits made during the war and prospective profits to be made upon war contracts. Now, what has the committee done as practical men? They bring in this bill which authorized the Secretary of the Treasury "under that war-time emergency act, to buy bonds ad libitum and continue in the business." The committee has reported a limitation that goes further than I would go, but as responsible agents of the House, knowing the temper of the House, the committee put a limit that the Treasury shall not purchase any bonds issued against any loans approved subsequent to March 1. We are undertaking to put a check on the situation and to meet these commitments and to clean up the business. In the meantime these banks will remain idle, their forces being disrupted; their employees are now being discharged, waiting for the Supreme Court of the United States to render their decision; and, I take it, it is a matter of common public interest. Certainly Congress having provided for adjustment of $3,000,000,000 of war contracts, which unadjusted, it was said, would bankrupt the banks which held the paper, which would bankrupt the manufacturer—Congress having recognized that certainly can put up a paltry thirty or forty million dollars to be expended in the purchase of the best bonds that ever floated in order to maintain and tide over the farm-loan system in this emergency, when we know every dollar will be paid.

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. I will yield.

Mr. GOOD. The gentleman does not mean to say that it was this Congress?

Mr. WINGO. Last Congress. The gentleman, I guess, voted for it.

Mr. MADDEN. I would like to have the gentleman tell us what contract obligation exists between the Government of the United States and this banker that went and borrowed money on his own paper, and what obligation we have on us to pass legislation to enable him to pay it?

Mr. WINGO. None whatever. The money was not borrowed on his own paper. The gentleman asked me what was outstanding, and I told him. In other words, as a member of the committee, I have made a clean breast to the House. That is the condition that exists. And does any gentleman say it is not a proper public business interest? Is there any sane man here who believes that the United States will ever lose a dollar? Did we not ask these banks not to go out and market their bonds during the Liberty loan campaign? Yes; we did. Why? Because we thought there were many investors in this country who thought them better than the restricted bonds we issued at that time. And we asked them to keep off the market, and the Treasury did buy $136,000,000 of them. We are facing a practical condition now. Are we going to clean up their commitments and let the farmers have the money for which they mortgaged their lands and which mortgages are now on record? Would you think it good policy to not meet this emergency?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, the rule properly protects the consideration of the bill and provides for debate and amendment in the usual way. I therefore move the previous question on the rule.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the rule.

The rule was agreed to.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the work of the Joint Committee on Printing.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum.
The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman reserve it for a moment?
Mr. MADDEN. Yes, sir.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the work of the Joint Committee on Printing. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.
Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum.
Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.
Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman withhold it?
Mr. MONDELL. I will withhold it.
Mr. MADDEN. I withdraw the point of no quorum.
Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, to-morrow, I think at 2 o'clock, there is to be a dedication of the memorial over at Arlington. I do not know, but as one Member of the House I hate to leave the House when it is in session, especially if any considerable number of Members have left. I am always here to try to make a quorum, but it seems to me that the dedication of that memorial to-morrow would justify an adjournment.
Mr. MONDELL. There is a special order for to-morrow, as the gentleman knows.
Mr. CANNON. What is it?
Mr. MONDELL. A special order for the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. UPSHAW] to address the House for one hour.
Mr. CANNON. Then, could we not have some agreement that at the end of that address we might go over to Arlington?
Mr. MONDELL. I do not know how many gentlemen will want to go to Arlington, Mr. Speaker. I think we can better determine that to-morrow than to-night.
Mr. CANNON. All right.

PRICE OF SILVER.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I have asked the Senator from Ohio to yield to me for a few moments only for the purpose of placing in the RECORD some important telegrams dealing with the price of silver. The price of silver has fallen below $1 an ounce, notwithstanding an act which was passed by Congress, generally known as the Pittman Act, providing that the Government shall buy American silver at $1 per ounce any time that it is presented for sale to the Government. This falling price is threatening the silver production of the country, and I think that publicity should be given with regard to it.

The principal object of the statement is that the producers of silver may be notified that upon the presentation of any silver mined and reduced in the United States at the mints at San Francisco, Denver, Philadelphia, or New York for sale under the Pittman Act the Government will buy such silver at $1 an ounce, even though the market price be less than $1 an ounce throughout the world.

I simply ask permission to place in the RECORD at this time that portion of the act of April 23, 1918, known as the Pittman Act, to which I have referred.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to have it read into the RECORD that we may hear what it is.

Mr. PITTMAN. Very well. I ask to have read the portion of section 2 of the act which I have marked.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Reading Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That upon every such sale of bullion from time to time the Secretary of the Treasury shall immediately direct the Director of the Mint to purchase in the United States, of the product of mines situated in the United States and of reduction works so located, an amount of silver equal to 371.25 grains of pure silver in respect of every standard silver dollar so melted or broken up and sold as bullion. Such purchases shall be made in accordance with the then existing regulations of the mint and at the fixed price of $1 per ounce of silver 1,000 fine, delivered at the option of the Director of the Mint at New York, Philadelphia, Denver, or San Francisco.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I have made inquiry at the Treasury Department and am informed that they are now about to promulgate a form of certificate to be used by producers of American silver to accompany any bullion that is presented under this act, and that when such silver bullion is presented at the mints named they will pay cash $1 an ounce for such silver.

There has been inquiry also made from numerous sources as to the reason for the fall in the price of silver below a dollar an ounce. I am informed by the best authorities I can obtain, and also by the experts of the Treasury Department, that it is caused by peculiar conditions. Germany is melting up its silver coin for the purpose of foreign exchange. France is doing the same. Germany was expected to purchase silver as a reserve behind its paper money. It has nothing with which to purchase silver or anything else. The only value that it has to purchase with to-day that has a par value is its silver coin. France is largely in the same position. For that reason there is an unusual quantity of silver suddenly thrown upon the market. It is only temporary, as I am informed by the authorities, because it will soon be absorbed in the world's markets, where there is a tremendous demand for silver; but that condition does exist.

There is another condition affecting it. The East—China and Japan—were starved for the want of silver during the entire war. Immediately after the cessation of the war or the signing of the armistice the embargo upon silver was lifted; these countries went into the markets and competed with each other for the purchase of silver, and they not only satisfied their demands but drove the price of silver quite high. That demand will again come, and come quickly, with the reestablishment of commerce, but such is the situation now.

I want it distinctly understood, however, that the act only protects silver produced and reduced in this country. We melted up 271,000,000 silver dollars under the Pittman Act. Under the act that 271,000,000 silver dollars must be returned to the Treasury of the United States in the form of coined silver dollars and the bullion for that purpose must be purchased from our American mines. In addition to that it must be purchased from our American mines whenever the silver is tendered at $1 an ounce, which is the price at which the silver so melted up was sold by our Government.

There is nothing to prevent Mexican or Canadian or German or French silver from being sold to the industries in this country at any price less than a dollar an ounce. Anyone may sell it for 50 cents an ounce. There is no attempt to protect that price of silver, so far as foreign countries are concerned, but, at the same time, when foreign silver is being sold in our markets to our industries at less than a dollar an ounce, our Government has obligated itself, and is pledged to carry out the obligation, to purchase American silver at $1 an ounce.

So there is only one thing for the producers of American silver to do, if they desire to sell silver when the market price is under a dollar, and that is to tender their silver bullion at the mint in New York, Philadelphia, Denver, or San Francisco, together with the proper certificate of its origin as American silver, and receive $1 an ounce.

I ask leave to place in the RECORD some correspondence that I have on the subject.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

NEVADA MINE OPERATORS' ASSOCIATION,
Reno, Nev., May 7, 1920.

Hon. KEY PITTMAN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: At the instance of silver-producing members of the association there was dispatched to you on May 5 the following message:

"It is rumored in San Francisco that Government is selling Treasury silver to India, thereby breaking price, which has sharply receded in last few days. Producers are anxious to ascertain reason for slump, and have therefore suggested that you might be able to supply desired information, if not incompatible."

I am to-day in receipt of your reply, for which I thank you.

On April 8 silver was quoted at $1.26. On April 22 it had declined to $1.18, and on the following day it went to $1.12. Yesterday it was $1.05¼, while to-day it is less than $1.03. Silver producers are greatly disturbed and are anxious to ascertain the reason; hence my telegram. The association will be grateful indeed for any information you can furnish on the subject.

With kindest personal regards.

Yours, very truly, HENRY M. RIVES, Secretary.

[Western Union Telegram.]

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 11, 1920.

HENRY M. RIVES,
Secretary, Nevada Mine Operators' Association,
Reno, Nev.

Replying your telegram: Have conferred with Treasury and mint officials. Have obtained all information possible at present. No truth in rumor that Government is selling silver to India or to any other foreign Government. Saw another telegram to-day from person in Reno stating San Francisco Mint closed. No truth in this statement. By law each mint required to clean up once a year and make settlement. During few days required for this purpose refining operations cease. Mint still accepting bullion for refinement and will settle on assay as soon as it can be made. Best authority for slump in price of silver I can obtain is as follows: At time of removal of embargo on shipment of silver China, Japan, and India were starving for silver because the amount they ordinarily absorbed each month from United States had been cut off during war. The large purchases made by these countries immediately after raising of embargo not only raised price of silver quickly but substantially satisfied absolute requirements of those countries. Germany was expected to buy silver as a reserve for her paper money. She has nothing with which to buy silver. She could only buy silver either with money or with goods. If she bought it with her paper money she would have to pay about $10 in her own money for every ounce of silver. Germany is not only not buying silver as was expected but selling silver. She is selling her silver reserve because it is the only thing that she has to sell. With what silver she has she can buy in the market at par. With her paper money she has got to pay ten times as much. This silver is temporarily helping to satisfy demand. All these conditions are only temporary. As commerce is reestablished between nations and its volume increased the demand for silver must increase with it. A sudden complication of such conditions might have driven silver down to where it was in 1915 but for Pittman Act. Inquiries are reaching Director of Mint from many sources asking if director will purchase silver when tendered to him at a dollar an ounce. Director is also being asked if he will purchase such silver if reduced in this country but mined in some other country. He has officially construed Pittman Act as meaning that it is obligatory upon him to purchase all silver tendered to him at a dollar an ounce until the $271,000,000 of silver that have been melted up have been recoined and placed in Treasury, provided that silver so tendered to him is not only produced but is reduced in United States. In other words, he will not accept any silver except silver actually mined in United States. He has prepared a certificate which must be duly executed and accompany every offer of a sale of silver to mint under Pittman Act.

KEY PITTMAN.

RENO, NEV., May 14, 1920.

Hon. KEY PITTMAN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Your telegram of 11th, which was published throughout State, was received with extraordinary interest. To-day's silver quotation is 99½ cents. Great concern is felt over possible further decline. Our understanding is that Pittman Act prevents silver from going below dollar until Treasury is replenished through purchase from domestic producers. Have been requested to obtain from you confirmation of this for publication and to ask you if Government will protect silver from declining below dollar under purchase provisions of Pittman Act. Could you wire statement for publication and also give publicity to same in East? Producers greatly disturbed and believe such action would stabilize situation.

HENRY M. RIVES.

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 15, 1920.

HENRY M. RIVES,
Secretary Nevada Mine Operators Association,
Reno, Nev.:

Pittman silver act only protects American silver. Mexican and Canadian silver may be sold at any price below a dollar to individual purchasers in United States. Even if foreign silver is being sold in United States for industries, the Director of Mint will purchase all American-mined silver tendered him at San Francisco, Philadelphia, and New York at $1 an ounce. Will give publicity in East through medium of United States Senate.

KEY PITTMAN.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Ohio yield to me?

Mr. POMERENE. Certainly.

Mr. THOMAS. Before the Senator from Nevada takes his seat I should like to inquire whether he believes that the reasons which have been assigned to him for this remarkable fall in the price of silver are the only ones entering into the equation?

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I am perfectly confident that those are elements of it. I would not be surprised, however, if there were a concerted movement for the purpose of bearing silver; but I am confident that the United States Government is not a party to it in any way.

Mr. THOMAS. I hope not.

Mr. PITTMAN. Because the Government would not be a party to placing silver below a dollar an ounce when it is announcing to-day that it is prepared to buy it at a dollar an ounce. The very object of the passage of this provision of the act was in anticipation of this very condition, that the time would come when certain interests of the world would bear the price of silver below its worth, and the only protection that industry would have would be the protection which we have now thrown around it by this act.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the Senator from Nevada will discover that the same old boycott and the same influences, constant and irresistible, have been again placed in operation because of the price which silver assumed on the markets of the world a short time ago.

Mr. PITTMAN. And but for this act they would drive it down to 50 cents an ounce, to which point, under the outrageous methods pursued, they drove it in 1915.

Mr. THOMAS. That is true; but even under the present conditions the silver-bullion producer will lose 25 cents an ounce upon his silver.

Mr. PITTMAN. Yes; and he would lose 50 cents an ounce more on his silver if it were not for this act.

15 May, 1920.

HOUSE BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

The following bills were each read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on Pensions:

H. R. 13944. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war; and

H. J. Res. 354. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to loan to Paul E. Slocumb Post, No. 85, Grand Army of the Republic, Bloomington, Ind., necessary tents, cots, and blankets for use at the State encampment to be held at said city May 25, 26, and 27, 1920, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had, on the 14th instant, approved and signed the act (S. 3016) to authorize the disposition of certain grazing lands in the State of Utah, and for other purposes.

TERMINATION OF WAR WITH GERMANY.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 327) terminating the state of war declared to exist April 6, 1917, between the Imperial German Government and the United States, permitting on conditions the resumption of reciprocal trade with Germany, and for other purposes.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, this joint resolution has been very ably discussed pro and con. I find myself in practical accord with the remarkably able speeches made against the resolution by the distinguished Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER], the distinguished Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], and the distinguished Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] so far as the legal features thereof are concerned. I am greatly disappointed when I find myself compelled to differ with the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] on any legal or constitutional question. I am in entire accord with what he says on the subject of the necessity for an early peace, and I am willing to join with him and my other colleagues in the Senate, as well as with the President, to bring about a peace—I hope a lasting peace—at the earliest possible moment. As I construe this resolution, it would be worse than useless to pass it. My belief is that even if it were legal it would not meet the presidential approval, and I do not believe that in its present form it is legal. Mr. President, I do not quite understand why we should attempt to do a vain thing.

It is argued, with very great force, that if the Congress of the United States has a right to pass a resolution it has a right to rescind or repeal it. With the general proposition I am in entire accord, but it can not change vested rights; it can not change conditions with regard to property or the status of individuals acquired during the state of war. In my judgment, this is not a resolution to rescind the war resolution; it is an attempt by legislative act to create a treaty.

Let us see what it is. Stripped of its legal phraseology, it provides, first, for the repeal of the resolution declaring a state of war; second, it declares the state of war ended; third, it provides that all property of Germany and German nationals which has come into the possession of the United States or its agents shall be retained and not be disposed of, except as Congress may hereafter provide, until Germany and the United States by treaty make provision for the satisfaction of all claims against the German Government subsequent to July 31, 1914, and until the German Government by treaty undertakings grants to citizens of the United States the most-favored-nation treatment in all matters affecting residence, business, trade, navigation, commerce, and industrial property rights; and, fourth, it confirms all fines, penalties, and seizures imposed or made by the United States, and compels Germany to waive all claims based upon events before said treaty takes effect, notwithstanding any existing treaty to the contrary. The President is then directed to open negotiations for the purpose of entering into a treaty.

I understand that a motion has been made to strike out the last provision; but, nevertheless, the effect of the resolution, if it is passed, is to depend not upon action of the Government agencies of the United States but is to depend upon some action of our enemy, the German Empire.

Mr. Oppenheim, in his work on International Law, in section 498, says:

A treaty being a convention, mutual consent of the parties is necessary. Mere proposals made by one party and not accepted by the other are, therefore, not binding upon the proposer.

And I take it, it makes no difference whether they are made by the Congress of the United States, acting in its legislative capacity, or by the President and the Senate, acting in their capacity of negotiator and ratifiers of treaties.

Then the author adds:

Without force are also pollicitations which contain mere promises without acceptance by the party to whom they were made.

That is exactly what this resolution is; but the resolution goes further even than I have thus far suggested. It provides:

SEC. 3. That until by treaty or act or joint resolution of Congress it shall be determined otherwise, the United States, although it has not ratified the treaty of Versailles, does not waive any of the rights, privileges, indemnities, reparations, or advantages to which it and its nationals have become entitled under the terms of the armistice signed November 11, 1918, or any extensions or modifications thereof or which under the treaty of Versailles have been stipulated for its benefit as one of the principal allied and associated powers and to which it is entitled.

Strange as it may seem, this is our position: While it is true that a treaty has been negotiated, it has not been ratified by the United States Senate; it has therefore—at least it was not so supposed until this proposition was made the other day—no binding effect upon the Government of the United States or its nationals, because it has failed of ratification. It is a mere pending proposition; and yet we are asked to pass a resolution by the terms of which we accept all the benefits that are to be derived from the treaty without undertaking any of its obligations.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

Mr. POMERENE. I yield.

Mr. KNOX. I know the Senator from Ohio does not desire to be inaccurate.

Mr. POMERENE. I certainly do not.

Mr. KNOX. The resolution does not accept any benefits under the treaty of Versailles; it simply does not waive any of those benefits until a satisfactory adjustment can be made.

Mr. POMERENE. I realize that.

Mr. KNOX. I understood the Senator to say that we accepted the benefits under the treaty.

Mr. POMERENE. That may be true, and I thank the Senator for the correction, but I fail to find any very great distinction between the two, speaking from a legal or constitutional standpoint.

Mr. KNOX. The distinction is simply this: The Senator, with his great legal ability, will at once accept the proposition that, even though a nation or an individual may not be a party to a contract, yet if there are stipulations made in a contract for the benefit of a nation or an individual, that nation or individual may accept them if it or he sees fit. The treaty of Versailles is full of stipulations of that kind for the benefit of countries that were not belligerents at all; and the whole scope of the resolution is to hold in statu quo whatever rights we might be entitled to have as against Germany, under the treaty of Versailles, until we have adjusted our relations.

Mr. POMERENE. Oh, I realize that; but we are holding this property which has been seized during the exercise of the war powers of the country, and we are claiming, for the time being at least, a possessory right. At least, we are denying to the enemies with whom we are seeking to make peace their right to the possession thereof. In other words, we are accepting the benefits of a treaty which we have refused to ratify and which therefore is not a treaty, so far as the United States is concerned.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I do not want to interrupt the Senator if it is at all disagreeable to him.

Mr. POMERENE. I would a little rather follow my own argument. However, I yield for a question.

Mr. REED. Just what is the matter with that, just as stated by the Senator, just as baldly as he has stated it? What is the matter with the proposition? If we had a war with Germany, and they injured us, and we have some of their property, and we have arrived now at a period when the war is ended——

Mr. POMERENE. If the Senator will pardon me——

Mr. REED. Let me finish the sentence.

Mr. POMERENE. Very well.

Mr. REED. If we say, "Now, the war is ended, and we are going to declare it an end, but in doing that we do not waive our right to this property; that is a matter that remains to be settled in the future, and we except it specifically in order that it may not be treated as having been included under the general clause," what is the matter with that?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I shall not take the time to answer the Senator in full at the present time, but will answer more fully later; but, so far as I am personally concerned, I decline to be put in the position that I am making peace and then insisting on having property and rights which will be subject for serious dispute and negotiation at some future time. In other words, I refuse to be put in a position where I will give to the enemy, if I have the right and the power to give to them, the thing which they want above everything else, renewal of commercial relations, and leave the most troublesome propositions for negotiation and settlement thereafter.

Now, Mr. President, I want to examine briefly the constitutional provisions so far as they relate to the treaty-making and the war-making powers; and I confess that I have not been able quite to understand the argument which has been presented upon this subject.

Under the war-making power, the Congress has the following war powers:

First. To declare war.

Second. To raise and support armies, but no appropriation of money to that use shall be for a longer term than two years.

Third. To provide and maintain a navy.

Fourth. To make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces.

Fifth. To provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions.

Sixth. To provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia.

Seventh. To make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers. To that is added "and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof."

These are enumerated powers, express powers; and clearly the constitutional fathers had it in their minds that it was just as necessary to have peace-making powers as it was to have war-making powers. Let us bear that fact in mind.

Then we have the following war-making power given to the President:

The President shall be Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy.

The Congress is further given the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations.

Now, observe: There is nothing in these declarations of war powers relating to peace. There is nothing vested in the Congress with relation to our foreign affairs save and except the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations. Now, where do we look for the peace-making power?

The President of the United States is given the power to negotiate treaties by and with the advice and the consent of the Senate. These provisions were not a mere accident. They were the result of the experience of the thirteen Colonies growing out of the Articles of Confederation. Let us examine them briefly.

In the Articles of Confederation it was provided:

ARTICLE IX. The United States in Congress assembled shall have the sole and exclusive right and power of determining on peace and war.

Without attempting to go into the situation, they had their difficulties in negotiating peace with France, growing out of some controversies between the two nations, the details of which it is not necessary to discuss. In the Constitutional Convention it was proposed that the Congress should be given the power to "make war." During the discussion it was stated that the power to "make war" included the power to "wage war," and it was thought unwise to place the power to "wage war" in a body so numerous as Congress, and so the convention substituted the words "declare war" for the words "make war." Then—and the matter was referred to here the other day in the discussion—one of the delegates, Mr. Butler, arose and moved to add the words "and peace" after the word "war," so that it would leave this provision of the Constitution to read "to declare war and peace."

Mr. THOMAS. "To make war."

Mr. POMERENE. That suggestion was made at some time during the proceedings. Strange to say, this amendment was unanimously defeated. Now, by all the rules of construction, where a proposition has been before a legislative body and an amendment of this kind is defeated, its defeat is strong evidence that it was intended not to give that particular power to the Congress of the United States. Of course, it is not conclusive, because there may be some other provision which would embrace it; but I submit, with all due respect, that the Senators who differ with me upon this subject have not yet found a single authority—at least, an American authority—which holds that the constitutional power to make war includes the power to make peace.

Let us bear in mind that this subject was taken care of. Under the Articles of Confederation the Congress had the right to make peace. That power is eliminated from our present Constitution, and we have the broad power conferred upon the President to negotiate peace or, rather, to negotiate treaties. That, of course, means with foreign nations or with the Indian tribes—nothing more and nothing less—and when do we attempt to negotiate treaties? Why, of course, we can do it in time of peace. We always attempt to do it, at least, after a war, for the purpose of negotiating and settling the terms upon which the two nations shall continue their peaceful negotiations and relations thereafter.

Mr. President, is there anything in this treaty-making provision which reserves to the Congress of the United States a concurrent treaty-making power? I have not been able to discover it, but let me go a little further.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. POMERENE. Yes; I yield.

Mr. KELLOGG. Suppose the treaty were to be ratified to-morrow by the Senate and published by the President, is it not true that the Congress the very same day could repudiate it and decline to make peace on the terms named in the treaty?

Mr. POMERENE. As a general proposition, yes; but let me remind the Senator that the word "treaty," as we understand it, is entirely different from what it is usually understood to be in international law. The treaty, so far as it defines the rights of our people, is a law. The Constitution makes it a part of the supreme law, but when it defines the relations between the United States of America and Germany it is a contract.

The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] the other day referred to the "Head money cases"—another paragraph, however—but there is one paragraph in the opinion bearing directly upon the question which the Senator from Minnesota has put to me. I want to read a part of it.

> A treaty is primarily a compact between independent nations. It depends for the enforcement of its provisions on the interest and the honor of the Governments which are parties to it.

Note that—on the "interest and the honor of the Governments."

> If these fail, its infraction becomes the subject of international negotiations and reclamations, so far as the interested party chooses to seek redress, which may in the end be enforced by actual war. It is obvious with all this the judicial courts have nothing to do and can give no redress.

That is as between the parties to the treaty; but when it comes to the definition of the rights of our nationals, then it has the force of law; it is the supreme law.

Now, let us see further as bearing upon the construction which I have placed upon the treaty-making power, and so forth.

Mr. Justice Story, in his work on the Constitution, section 11735, edition 3, says:

> It was proposed to add the power to make peace, but this was unanimously rejected upon the plain ground that it more properly belonged to the treaty-making power. The experience of Congress under the Federation, of the difficulties attendant on vesting the treaty-making power in a large legislative body, was too deeply felt to justify the hazard of another experiment.

Think of it, Senators! Imagine the Congress of the United States sitting with the Parliament of Great Britain and the Parliament of France and the Reichstag of Germany. You would have a regular bedlam. It would be as impossible for them to negotiate a peace as it would for those several bodies to conduct or make war.

But let me go further. On March 13, 1798, Oliver Ellsworth wrote to Jonathan Trumbull bearing upon this subject. I want to read a paragraph or two:

> The grant of the treaty-making power is in these words: "The President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall make treaties." The power goes to all kinds of treaties, because no exception is expressed and also because no treaty-making power is elsewhere granted to others, and it is not to be supposed that the Constitution has omitted to vest sufficient power to make all kinds of treaties which have been usually made or which the existence or interests of the Nation may require.
> The effect of treaties is declared in these words: "All treaties made under the authority of the United States shall be supreme laws of the land." The Constitution gives them this effect, and they do not, therefore, need or derive it from congressional resolutions or statutes. The instant the President and Senate have made a treaty the Constitution makes it a law of the land; and, of course, all persons and bodies in whatever station or department within the jurisdiction of the United States are bound to conform their actions and proceedings to it.

Now, Mr. President, this is not without reason, and I take it the 96 Senators generally acknowledge the treaty-making power was properly exercised by the President and that we were performing our functions when we sought to ratify it; but only after it became apparent that the President and the Senate of the United States could not adjust their differences they seek to find some other method of embarrassing the President.

There is a very good reason why the power to declare war should be lodged in one body and the power to make peace in another. The Congress of the United States declares war. We ask no permission from anyone. We, in the exercise of our sovereign power, declare war, we wage war, and the Commander in Chief of the armies and navies leads our armies and navies against the enemy. There is not any reason why we should consult any other power, least of all why we should consult our enemy.

We fight them, and we conquer them if we can; otherwise we may be conquered. But our action is under our absolute control. For that reason it is well that the Congress, representing the sovereign people, should be vested with that power.

But when it comes to the negotiating of peace we can not negotiate a peace ourselves. It takes two to make a peace. It takes two men to settle their differences; one man can not settle them. It takes two nations to settle their differences; one nation can not settle them, unless they overcome and absolutely subjugate the enemy.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. POMERENE. I yield.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator regard peace as a condition of fact or merely as a condition of contract?

Mr. POMERENE. Both, sir.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator maintain that there can not be a status of peace unless there has been a signed agreement?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, there can not be any difference between the distinguished Senator and myself bearing upon that subject. Of course there can be a de facto peace.

Mr. REED. It can be a de jure peace, too.

Mr. POMERENE. That may be so, but it will be a de jure peace when it has been acquiesced in for so long a time—and I am not clear about that—as to cast aside all doubt. It is a de jure peace when the proper body declares and makes and negotiates and ratifies that peace, and not before.

Mr. President, let us go along a little further with this matter. In my humble judgment the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], when he seeks to preserve all rights, or privileges, if you choose, which are to be given to us under the Versailles treaty, and when he suggests that there shall be a negotiation for a completed treaty, clearly proves that this resolution is not of itself sufficient to settle all the terms of the disputes between the two nations.

Then, Mr. President, let us go a little further. I was very much interested in the Senator's argument when he tried to prove that there was a peace, that Germany is at peace with the United States, and that peace, according to the distinguished Senator, comes about because under article 440 of the treaty of peace we find this:

> A first procès-verbal of the deposit of ratifications will be drawn up as soon as the treaty has been ratified by Germany, on the one hand, and by three of the principal allied and associated powers, on the other hand.

And then the treaty further provides:

> From the date of this first procès-verbal the treaty will come into force between the high contracting parties who have ratified it.

We have not ratified it at all. Then it further provides:

> For the determination of all periods of time provided for in the present treaty this date—that is, the date when the procès verbal is deposited—> will be the date of the coming into force of the treaty.

Because there are dozens and dozens of provisions in this treaty to the effect that certain things shall be done or accomplished by the German Empire within a given number of days or years after "the coming into force of the present treaty."

Then, wonderful to relate, while he has gone to very great pains to demonstrate that Germany is at peace, "as of the date of the deposit of the ratifications by Germany and by three of the principal allied and associated powers," he provides that the date of the passage of the pending joint resolution shall be the date when we shall be at peace. I do not understand that argument.

But now, Mr. President, let me direct the Senator's attention to another feature of this case. In 1785 the treaty of Prussia was negotiated and ratified. Article 23 of it reads as follows:

> If war should arise between the two contracting parties, the merchants of either country then residing in the other shall be allowed to remain nine months to collect their debts and settle their affairs, and may depart freely, carrying off all their effects without molestation or hindrance; and all women and children, scholars of every faculty, cultivators of the earth, artisans, manufacturers, and fishermen, unarmed and inhabiting unfortified towns, villages, or places, and in general all others whose occupations are for the common subsistence and benefit of mankind, shall be allowed to continue their respective employments, and shall not be molested in their persons, nor shall their houses be burnt or otherwise destroyed, nor their fields wasted by the armed force of the enemy into whose power by the events of war they may happen to fall; but if anything is necessary to be taken from them for the use of such armed force, the same shall be paid for at a reasonable price.

This treaty by its terms was to continue for 10 years. In 1799 another treaty of amity and commerce was negotiated. It expired 10 years later, on June 22, 1810.

A new treaty of commerce and navigation was ratified in May, 1828. Article 13, above quoted, was in substance incorporated in the new treaty.

But there is this significant provision in the last treaty:

If war should arise between the two contracting parties, the merchants of either country then residing in the other shall be allowed to remain nine months to collect their debts and settle their affairs and may depart freely, carrying off all their effects, without molestation or hindrance.

That provision was practically the same as in the earlier treaty. Then, in the treaty of 1828, known as the new treaty of commerce and navigation, there is the further provision that by its terms this treaty is made "applicable in time of peace as well as in time of war."

The provisions to which I have referred have been reincorporated into the last treaty, and it was made self-continuing, and it has at no time been denounced.

Of course, we can not say what the effect of this war is going to be on these treaty obligations. Our courts can not determine that. German courts can not determine that. That is a question to be determined by the belligerents themselves by negotiation, and if they can not agree, then it must be determined by some court of arbitration or a league of nations, if you please; and if it can not be determined in either one of these ways, then the only other way to determine it is by the arbitrament of the sword.

In spite of the provisions of these Prussian treaties our Government seized German property in the United States and the German Government seized American property in Germany, the property of nationals as well as of the Governments themselves. All of those questions will rise up like Banquo's ghost if you pass a joint resolution of this kind.

By this joint resolution it is claimed that we are bringing about peace; in other words, we are restoring a condition which was the excuse for our seizing this property. Assuming for the sake of argument that this joint resolution should pass and should be approved by the President, if we are to give it the construction which is sought to be placed upon it by the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania, war, which was the excuse for our seizing alien property, is at an end. There is not only a de facto peace but a de jure peace.

Who is going to determine the title to this property? Our courts? Who is going to determine the title of American nationals in Germany to their property? Let us see: The resolution is passed. All of this property is held in nubibus. How are we to determine its ownership and the countless claims for indemnity?

Commercial relations are restored. Germany is getting from us all the raw materials and other supplies that she wants. She is not very much disturbed about making speedy reimbursement for the wrongs she has done the American people. By passing the resolution we are giving them all they want, because that is what it means, and we will thereby defer the settlement of the question of their indemnity to our nationals for a future time.

Mr. President, I confess I do not see how it can be claimed for a minute that we have any rights or any privileges, personal or property, under the Versailles treaty until we ratify it. In my humble judgment that question is not open to dispute or discussion, and it would not have been thought of here save for the fact that there has been this difference between the Executive and the Senate of the United States.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. POMERENE. I yield.

Mr. REED. The Senator has spoken about the renewal of trade with Germany. I did not understand whether he meant that it would be renewed after the joint resolution had been passed or whether it has already been renewed.

Mr. POMERENE. There has been some renewal of it by special permission or special license, I understand.

Mr. REED. It has amounted to $145,000,000 this year, has it not?

Mr. POMERENE. I think since negotiations began it has amounted to $145,000,000, but it is on a very restricted basis, as the Senator knows, and it is only a modicum compared with the amount that we had prior to the war.

Mr. REED. Is it not true, if the Senator will indulge me for a further question, that every restriction there is on it was put on by the executive department of the Government——

Mr. POMERENE. Oh, I suppose so.

Mr. REED. That it all acts injuriously to us, and that it can be removed in a moment's time by Executive action?

Mr. POMERENE. I do not know. Whatever the Executive has done has been by virtue of the authority conferred upon him by the Congress of the United States and because he thought it for the protection of the American people.

Mr. REED. Will the Senator pardon me while I state that the information I have, and I get it direct from the State Department, is that there are practically no restrictions upon trade or commerce between this country and Germany to-day?

Mr. POMERENE. That may be so. That does not alter the legal question we are trying to discuss, in my judgment.

More than that, just think of the situation in which the United States is placed. We fought this war together; we negotiated a peace treaty together. Some differences have arisen between the President and the Senate of the United States, and now it is proposed by the solemn act of the Congress of the United States that we shall ignore everything that has been done by the Executive and by our allies in order that we shall make a separate peace. Other Senators may take pride in that position. I do not. I was ready to stand by, and did stand by, our allies when we were fighting this war, and I would be ashamed of myself if I were to desert them now in the negotiation of peace.

Mr. REED. I do not wish to be constantly interrupting the Senator, but he is discussing a very important question. Is it not true that we stood by our allies until they made their peace, wrote it in their own words, and compelled it to be signed, and that under the terms thus signed they have obtained everything they wanted? Have we not stood by them until they got their peace on their own terms, and now have we not a perfect right to make our peace on our own terms?

Mr. POMERENE. No; we have not. We have deserted them and left upon their shoulders the responsibilities of preserving peace. The Senator and I differ so radically that we could not agree upon this proposition if we both lived to be as old as Methuselah.

Mr. REED. I think that is true.

Mr. POMERENE. Yes; I think so.

Mr. President, let me go a step further. Assume, for the sake of the argument, that the joint resolution is passed and it goes to the President. What is to happen then? One of two things will happen. If it come back here disapproved, what do we gain? Only this, that it will enable our friends on the other side of the Chamber to say, "Well, we put the President in a hole."

It will not be a hole, even if it is vetoed, because the great American people can understand what the treaty-making power is and what it was for, and they know what the uniform practice has been heretofore with respect to the making of treaties, and they are not going to sit silently by and see these strained constructions and give very much comfort to those favoring the joint resolution for the purpose of putting the President in the hole.

What else can be done? The other alternative is that it be approved. Then what have we got? Have we got a real repeal of the joint resolution? And if so, what is it? Bear in mind, please, that the resolution which was passed on April 6, 1917, was not a resolution declaring war. There already was war against the United States, war made by Germany. All the Congress of the United States did was to pass a resolution declaring solemnly that there was a state of war brought on by the aggressions of Germany.

Then what have we done? We have simply repealed a resolution which was a formal declaration that there was a state of war. It is true that the resolution goes a little further and declares that there is a state of peace. I do not believe Congress would be guilty of a very much greater violation of the Constitution if they themselves sought to negotiate the peace than to declare peace on the terms contained in this joint resolution with all conditions and reservations contained therein.

Then think of the situation. The distinguished Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] the other day in his colloquy with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] did not agree with him that the passage of the joint resolution would bring on a state of peace, so far as our nationals in Germany were concerned. Of course it could not. We can not by our legislative action declare a status for the American nationals in Germany any more than they by some law can declare a status for their nationals dwelling in the United States or describing the status of their property.

But now we are put in this position under the joint resolution. We make a proposition to them for a state of peace; we keep the property of their Government and their nationals; but this is contingent upon the German Parliament doing something akin to it; in other words, we are going to place within the two legislative bodies of the two different countries the power to make and to ratify the peace treaty.

Let me go a step further, because this raises a very serious constitutional question. Has the Congress, by a bare majority, the right to declare the status of this property, what indemnities they shall pay to us, and do all of this in a way that will be absolutely binding upon our nationals who have suffered losses and upon our Government? Are they not interested in it? Of course they are, and for this reason. Bear in mind, and I think there can be no doubt about it, that this proposed action at least relates to the treaty-making power, but the constitutional fathers in their wisdom provided in the Constitution that a treaty should be negotiated by the President, and that it should receive the advice and consent of two-thirds of the Members of the Senate voting thereon. When you have a treaty passed in that way, as declared by the Constitution of the United States, it is part of the supreme law of the land. It is enforceable in our courts as a law of the land. In our relations with Germany it is a contract. The treaty-making power by a two-thirds vote might give to our nationals certain rights and impose certain obligations, but the Congress by a bare majority vote might confer other rights and impose other obligations. Would not this course raise a very serious controversy as to whether what was done by the Congress was a valid act or not when it related to the property and personal rights or obligations of German nationals here or of our nationals in Germany?

Laying all differences aside, the negotiations of treaties is but a very ordinary thing, speaking from a standpoint of authority. It is the ordinary way to settle extraordinary disputes; but here comes the very able Senator from Pennsylvania, and he attempts to do a very ordinary thing by a very extraordinary method; a method, if you please, which has never been heard of before in the history of our country.

Mr. President, I do not care to discuss the legal questions further. What I have said is not a mere opinion with me; it is a conviction; and I should vote against the resolution if I stood alone, because, first, I doubt the authority of Congress to pass it; and, second, I have no doubt about the impolicy of it.

At the same time, Mr. President, I join with the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania and with all my brethren here in the Senate in the hope that there may be a speedy peace; and I stand ready at any and all times to further any movement that will lead to peace. That is my solemn duty, as I conceive it to be under my oath of office. But the method proposed by the pending resolution will lead to no good result. There is just one way to do this, in my judgment, and that is for the President, if he shall see fit, to send the treaty back to the Senate—and it ought to come back here—with some message which would look to the adjustment of our differences. The Senate is, in part, to blame for the existing condition and, I regret to say, the Chief Executive is not altogether free from fault. It has seemed to me that at one end of the Avenue an unalterable position has been taken and at the other end of the Avenue an immovable position. Meanwhile the whole American people, aye, the whole world, looks on and suffers.

Mr. President, except a declaration of war, the settlement of the terms of peace is the most solemn duty that ever fell to the Senate of the United States. We performed our duty in the conduct of the war to the satisfaction of the people of the United States, and we ought to make peace to their satisfaction. My guess is that while each of us comes here as an ambassador of his own State, the constituency of no one of us expects us to sit here determined to have our own way. We are expected to make reasonable compromises with our associates. No great statute was ever passed without compromise; no great treaty, settling the international affairs of two nations, was ever negotiated and ratified without compromise.

Mr. President, for the reasons which I have thus in part stated, I hope the pending resolution will be defeated.

Mr. WALSH of Montana rose.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I had expected to address myself to the subject matter before the Senate for a few minutes, but I will yield until the Senator from Montana has concluded.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I entertain no doubt whatever of the competency of Congress, with the approval of the President, or by overriding his veto in the manner prescribed by the Constitution, to enact legislation such as that contemplated in the resolution before us. How Congress can reflectingly do so, as a matter of policy, I find it impossible to conceive, and can not believe that if Members would but divest themselves of the passions aroused by the heated debate over the treaty and disregard what they conceive to be the dictates of wise political strategy in the face of an impending presidential campaign, Congress ever would give its approval to this resolution.

That Congress may repeal all the legislation it enacted for the successful prosecution of the war, the trading-with-the-enemy act, the food-control act, for example, I dare say no one will deny. Such, I understand, to be one of the purposes of the resolution, and particularly of section 2 thereof. But certain important consequences flow from a plain declaration of war such as the historic resolution of April 6, 1917, though no specific statute were passed interdicting trade with the enemy. All intercourse between the belligerents becomes illegal. Every kind of trading or commercial dealing or intercourse, whether by transmission of goods or orders for the delivery of either between the two countries at war, directly or indirectly, or through the intervention of third persons or partnerships, or by contracts in any form looking to or involving such transactions, is prohibited. It follows that every contract by the nationals of one belligerent with the other or with the nationals thereof is void and will be so treated by the courts. Property that is the subject of any such contracts or that is used in carrying on contraband trade may be seized by either belligerent, but unless there is in effect some specific statute, such as the trading-with-the-enemy act, no penal consequences follow, so far as the United States is concerned.

I take it that the effect of the resolution, if it becomes a law, will be not only to bar any criminal prosecution on account of intercourse with the public enemy or its nationals but to remove all danger of confiscation of any property involved, and to give validity to any contracts growing out of such intercourse—rather to remove the taint of invalidity which would otherwise affect them in consequence of the declaration of war. That such action is within the power of Congress, the President approving, or his veto being rendered nugatory, can not, as I think, be seriously questioned. It can not be open to serious doubt that limited intercourse with the public enemy may be permitted, even in the midst of hostilities, by act of Congress which may prescribe the conditions under which such trade as is tolerable may be carried on. It was so held in Hamilton v. Dillin (21 Wall., 73). If limited intercourse may be permitted, unrestricted trade may necessarily be authorized. And if inter arma unrestricted trade may be authorized, there is no room to contend that when all hostilities have ceased there is any constitutional objection to such legislation.

I can not believe that anything that transpired in the Constitutional Convention can be interpreted as a purpose on its part to withhold such power from Congress. It is easily conceivable that we should engage in war with some country, and that though hostilities had ceased it should decline to enter into any negotiations with us looking to a treaty of peace, but should eventually tolerate commercial intercourse between its nationals and ours. It is inconceivable that Congress by law, the President approving in the constitutional manner, can not legalize contracts growing out of such transactions. Reference is made to the debates in the convention from which it appears that when the clause in the Constitution to the effect that Congress shall have power to declare war was under consideration it was proposed to make it read "Congress shall have power * * * to declare war and peace." The suggestion was not adopted, and from this circumstance it is argued that a status of peace can not be brought about by action of Congress. But I can not believe that the action taken by the convention goes further than to deny to Congress the right to enter into negotiations with a belligerent looking to a treaty of peace or to enter into such a treaty with a foreign power. The convention wisely concluded to intrust such negotiations to the Executive—Congress could scarcely conduct them save through plenipotentiaries of its choice, and it was a part of the general scheme that all such and all officers of the United States—save only some filling minor stations—should be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate. Moreover, being charged with the conduct of intercourse generally between our Government and other nations, the appropriateness of having negotiations for peace treaties conducted through him was obvious.

It was recognized, furthermore, by the wise framers of the Constitution, though some of our contemporaries do not seem to appreciate the fact, that, as was so forcefully stated a few moments ago by the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr.

POMERENE], though one nation may declare or make war, it takes at least two to make peace. They doubtless reflected that it approached an absurdity to say that Congress may declare peace. Congress might declare until doomsday, but there would be no peace until the other belligerent concluded as well that the struggle should cease.

Whether Congress, having once declared war and thus authorized the President as Commander in Chief to conduct hostilities at his discretion against the enemy, may by a resolution repealing such declaration before a treaty of peace becomes effective deprive him of the power to wage war upon the foe, through such forces and by such means as are at his command, it is entirely unnecessary to consider. No such condition is likely now or ever to arise.

But this resolution, if the expression be parliamentary, is economic idiocy. We give everything and get nothing. We abolish all restrictions on the importation into this country of goods bearing the "made in Germany" trade-mark without any agreement with that country that she will admit all or any of ours into her territory. We invite the representatives of the commercial houses of Germany again to overrun our cities, while she is at liberty to shut her gates on any American merchant, manufacturer, or banker, on our growers of cotton, corn, and live stock, our producers of copper, who may desire to deal with her people. We permit the reestablishment in our midst of the industrial plants that prior to the war enriched so many of her war-mad minions, and that became centers of sedition and disloyalty after we entered it, without any assurance that an American firm may even set up an agency in the city of Hamburg. We throw open our ports to emigrants from her impoverished States and Provinces and admit them to citizenship on exactly the same terms as are accorded to the citizens of our faithful Allies or the liberated people of the new Republics we have aided in creating within her former territory without any guaranty that an American may remain overnight in a hotel in Munich, Dresden, or Berlin.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SIMMONS in the chair). Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. REED. Can not all that be cured by a simple act of Congress excluding their goods or their peoples or naming the conditions under which they may enter this country?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is the law now. We do not need any more legislation. That is the law, which this resolution will operate to repeal. That is the purpose of this joint resolution, to destroy all these laws under which the President of the United States can keep them and their goods out of this country.

Mr. REED. The Senator is discussing the repeal clause. I thought he was discussing the general situation.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I am discussing the general situation. The general situation is that this joint resolution says, in effect, to the Germans: "Come here just the same as you did before the war; occupy exactly the same status; you are friends of ours"; while Germany is at perfect liberty to treat our nationals as enemies, and to exclude them from her territory if she sees fit to do so.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator contend that if we pass this peace resolution the Congress can not the next day bar all trade with Germany if it wants to?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Why, certainly not. You may repeal all these laws to-day, you may pass this joint resolution to-day, and to-morrow you may repeal and rescind your act, if you care to do so.

Mr. REED. Oh, yes; but let us take one thing at a time.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes; I am taking one thing at a time.

Mr. REED. I was not referring to the Senator's remark. The proposition now is to declare that this war is at an end. The Senator says that certain consequences flow from that; among others, that German citizens can come here and Germany can come to our markets.

Does the Senator think that the old treaties with Germany will be revived and repealed by virtue of this mere declaration that the war is at an end? On the contrary, are not all those treaties dead? Do they not require a new act?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator wants one thing at a time. Those treaties are not dead. The Supreme Court of the United States has decided repeatedly that treaties do not die by reason of the fact that the parties to them enter into a war.

Mr. REED. They undoubtedly die as far as any rights of the parties to enter another country are concerned. Now, does the Senator claim that Congress can not pass this joint resolution and to-morrow, by any act that it sees fit to pass, enumerate the terms and conditions upon which Germans can enter?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Why, certainly. That is the question the Senator asked me a little while ago. You propose to-day to repeal all these laws and to-morrow to reenact them. That is the situation.

Mr. REED. Oh, well, I am speaking about the war status now.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I, too, am speaking about the war status.

Mr. REED. Very well.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The proposition is to repeal all these statutes. Of course, you can reenact them at any time you want to.

Mr. REED. No; there are two questions. I do not want to take the Senator's time, but let me state my point clearly.

The peace resolution embraces two propositions: One is to declare a state of peace. That is the proposition I have been discussing. There is another clause of the peace resolution which proposes to repeal certain of our war legislation. That is quite another question.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I am undertaking to deal with both of those questions. I have undertaken to show that the repeal of the declaration of war removes the taint of invalidity upon every contract that may be entered into with German nationals. The repeal of the specific acts takes away all the penal consequences of intercourse with Germany in violation of such statutes.

Mr. REED. The Senator knows that we have restored trade with Germany?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes; I am going to talk about that.

Mr. REED. And that it is going on right now, practically unrestricted?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes; I shall discuss that presently. I shall be glad to give the Senator the exact facts and the exact figures.

I was discussing, Mr. President, the one-sided character of this proposition when interrupted by the Senator. I continue.

The resolution must be construed as in the nature of an invitation to her to send consular agents to our cities to promote her trade here, with the assurance that the appropriate exequatur will be issued to them, under which they will enjoy not only the right to officiate as authorized by their government, but be entitled to the privileges which attach to a representative of a foreign state; among others, the sanctity of his official residence and exemption from suit in any State court and the right to invoke the original jurisdiction of the Supreme Court. We must depend upon the friendly disposition of Germany to accord a similar hospitality to our consular and commercial agents.

The resolution provides that all property of Germany or its nationals seized by the United States shall be retained until, by treaty, Germany makes provision to indemnify American citizens for all losses sustained through her acts since July 31, 1914, which treaty shall contain the usual favored-nation clause and shall confirm to the United States all fines, forfeitures, penalties, and seizures imposed or made by the United States during the war.

An analysis of these provisions will be made later.

As reported, the resolution requested the President immediately to open negotiations with the Government of Germany, to the end, among others, that such a treaty might be entered into; but this feature was, on the motion of the chairman of the committee reporting it, eliminated. Doubtless he felt some delicacy about expressly preferring such a request, remembering what he said in an article contributed by him to The Forum of June, 1918, from which I quote:

> The President who delivered the war message and the Congress who voted for war would be guilty of the blackest crime if they were willing to make a peace on the status quo ante bellum and recreate the situation which existed before the war. If we sent our armies and our young men abroad to be killed and wounded in northern France and Flanders with no result but this, our entrance into the war with such an intention was a crime which nothing can justify. The intent of Congress and the intent of the President was that there could be no peace until we could create a situation where no such war as this could recur. We can not, in the first place, make peace except in company with our allies. It would brand us with everlasting dishonor and bring ruin to us also if we undertook to make a separate peace.

But the excision of the specific request is of no consequence. The other provisions of the treaty clearly contemplate that a separate treaty with Germany shall be made, and the President is necessarily looked to for the initiation of the negotiations—is, indeed, charged with the duty of entering into such, since the resolution, at least in one part, proceeds upon the assumption that we may not honorably or honestly keep the property which fell into our hands as the spoils of war except as collateral to secure the discharge by Germany of obligations justly due our people.

In the fateful days of August, September, October, and early November, 1918, Germany was by the valor of our brave sons—75,000 of whom—

Sleep the sleep that knows no waking—beaten to her knees. Her military power had been broken, and our victorious armies would have marched with little impediment to Berlin had she not thrown up her hands and shouted "Kamerad!" We were, with our allies, in a position to make such a peace as the senior Senator from Massachusetts demanded, and which he epigrammatically described as a "dictated," not a "negotiated," peace. In his speech of August 23, 1918, he said:

It can not be a peace of bargain, of give and take, and of arrangement. * * * No peace that satisfies Germany in any degree can ever satisfy us. It can not be a negotiated peace. It must be a dictated peace, and we and our allies must dictate it.

But forthwith, the armistice being signed, the anvil chorus started the refrain "Bring the boys home," repeating it endlessly, with the obvious purpose of conveying the impression that the administration was coldly indifferent to the very natural desire on both sides of the ocean to see reunited the families that had been separated by the war. This form of criticism was persisted in, though never in the feverish haste with which they had been sent to Europe were we able to move as many or to move them as fast as we were bringing our soldiers home. Just how we were going to secure a "dictated" peace without a formidable army on German soil, or in a position immediately to cross her borders, was left to conjecture. But the two demands went up simultaneously and insistently. Marshal Foch, however, succeeded in maintaining such a status as to enable the congress at Versailles to frame a peace treaty meeting the requirement that it should be "dictated," not "negotiated." This treaty has had the approval of all of our allies, but has been rejected by the Senate, which is about to ask not only for a separate treaty with Germany, but for a negotiated and not a dictated treaty. Obviously, if we are to have a treaty with Germany at all, it must be negotiated—it must be a give-and-take proposition. We have no such force on German soil or elsewhere as is requisite to enable us to dictate terms of peace to her. Our allies have made their terms with her, and could not consistently with their treaty join us in any warlike movement or demonstration to coerce her into acquiescence in our demands.

But we occupy a commanding position economically in connection with any negotiations which might be carried on. Despite the burdens of the war, the credit of our Government is unimpaired. Our industries have been untouched by its ravages. Our productive capacity continues to expand. We are rich. Germany trembles on the brink of bankruptcy. Unrestricted access to American markets is one of the first conditions of her resuscitation. American capital to revitalize her industrial and transportation systems is another.

To buy raw material of us on credit and pay for it in fabricated products is the simple formula of the German for the restoration of industry in the Fatherland. Details are set out in a Berlin dispatch appearing in the Washington Post of to-day, which I ask to be printed as an appendix to my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. In any negotiations for the re-establishment of relations of amity with Germany we still hold the trump cards. These it is proposed by the resolution deliberately to throw away. Did I not know too well the acumen of its authors, I should say that some clever German intriguer, some modern Machiavelli, had played upon their prejudices and thus produced it.

The President is expected to negotiate with Germany a treaty of amity and commerce, and he is bound hand and foot before the pourparlers begin.

What is to be accomplished by the resolution? It is loudly proclaimed that its purpose is to permit or to accomplish the restoration of commercial relations with Germany. But so far as action on our part can attain that end, it has already been achieved. By the so-called espionage act, approved June 15, 1917, it was provided that—

Whenever during the present war the President shall find that the public safety shall so require and shall make proclamation thereof, it shall be unlawful to export from, or ship from, or take out of, the United States to any country named in such proclamation any article or articles mentioned in such proclamation, except at such time or times, and under such regulations and orders, and subject to such limitations and exceptions as the President shall prescribe, until otherwise ordered by the President or by Congress: Provided, however, That no preference shall be given to the ports of one State over those of another.

Pursuant to this act the President made proclamation forbidding the exportation of goods to Germany.

By the trading-with-the-enemy act of October 6, 1917, it was provided that—

Whenever during the present war the President shall find that the public safety so requires and shall make proclamation thereof it shall be unlawful to import into the United States from any country named in such proclamation any article or articles mentioned in such proclamation except at such time or times, and under such regulations or orders, and subject to such limitations and exceptions as the President shall prescribe, until otherwise ordered by the President or by Congress: Provided, however, That no preference shall be given to the ports of one State over those of another.

Appropriate proclamation was made under this act, so that all trade with Germany was prohibited under penalties prescribed by the laws referred to, the administration of which, in the particulars that are important here, was by Executive order intrusted to the War Trade Board.

Upon the dissolution of that organization, after the conclusion of the armistice, its powers were vested in the War Trade Board section of the State Department, which on July 14, 1919, issued the following announcement:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, WAR TRADE BOARD SECTION,
Washington, July 14, 1919.

Resumption of trade with Germany.

The War Trade Board section of the Department of State announced that a general enemy-trade license has been issued authorizing all persons in the United States, on and after July 14, 1919, to trade and communicate with persons residing in Germany and to trade and communicate with all persons with whom trade and communication is prohibited by the trading-with-the-enemy act, subject, however, to the following specific limitations and exceptions, to wit:

1. The above-mentioned general license does not authorize the importation into the United States from Germany or elsewhere of dyes, dyestuffs, potash, drugs, or chemicals which have been produced or manufactured in Germany.

2. The above-mentioned general license does not modify or affect in any respect present restrictions against trade and communication between the United States and Hungary or that portion of Russia under the control of the bolshevik authorities.

3. The above-mentioned general license does not authorize trade with respect to any property which heretofore, pursuant to the provisions of the trading-with-the-enemy act as amended has been reported to the Alien Property Custodian or should have been so reported to him, or any property which heretofore, pursuant to the provisions of said act, the Alien Property Custodian has seized or has required to be conveyed, transferred, assigned, delivered, or paid over to him.

Exports to and imports from Germany may take place under Special Export License RAC No. 77 and General Import License PBF No. 37, as announced in W. T. B. R. 803 and W. T. B. R. 804, respectively.

Other related orders I ask be printed as an appendix to my remarks.

Apparently the only effect of the joint resolution before us on trade with Germany will be to permit the unrestricted importation from that country of dyes, dyestuffs, potash, drugs, and chemicals, a result that could be arrived at by a simple modification of the order of July 14, 1919, referred to.

Under the operation of the order, anticipated by others less comprehensive, trade with Germany has been carried on unhampered on this side of the water, imports having come to us from there since the armistice to March 20, 1919, of the value of $26,272,081 and exports having departed for Germany to the value of $147,300,934. For the first three months of 1920 the exports and imports amounted, respectively, to $54,214,620 and $15,361,716. If the same ratio is observed for the remainder of the current year Germany will take more in value of our products than she did in 1913. Evidently she is greedily availing herself of the opportunity to trade with us. We can get along without her trade. It would be disastrous to her to lose the privilege of dealing with us. She enjoys it now by virtue of the order issued under the authority of the President pursuant to the law of Congress. He may withdraw it at will or modify the order under which it is enjoyed. Why take that power away from him at the same time that he is charged with the duty of negotiating a treaty such as that contemplated in the joint resolution?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I have been listening to the debates here in the Senate on the question of putting an embargo on the importation of dyestuffs. Does the Senator understand that if this joint resolution were to pass, and the so-called dyestuff bill should fail of passage, then dyestuffs from Germany could be imported into the United States?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I do.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. And at the present time there is an embargo upon the importation of dyestuffs, by virtue of this order of the War Trade Board, which would be repealed by this joint resolution?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Exactly. It is the only effect of this joint resolution, so far as trade with Germany is concerned, to admit these prohibited articles.

Confronted with the facts that trade is now open with Germany, the acute as well as usually candid junior Senator from Minnesota asserts that it is hampered because we have no consular representatives in that country, but when asked how the adoption of the pending joint resolution affects that situation and what there is in it that entitles us to send consuls to German cities, if anything we could do without the consent of Germany could confer upon us that right, he answers with much nonchalance and a little attempt at disdain that he had no doubt she would gladly welcome our consuls. She may indeed do so. She may receive them with open arms without this joint resolution. She is at perfect liberty to accord them the requisite official status whether we enact this legislation or kill it, and, so far as I can judge, is as likely to do so in the one case as in the other.

Some nations might, indeed, moved by such generosity on the part of a late enemy as it is proposed by this resolution the United States shall display with respect to Germany, exhibit in the official acts of their Government the gratitude it ought to excite. But let us not act in this matter in the hope of reciprocal favors from our late enemy. Germany hates us, and with good cause from her point of view. Before we entered the war we were abomination in her eyes because we permitted trade in munitions in which, because of her relative weakness as a sea power, she was unable to participate. She had her enemies with their backs to the wall when we went in, and she blames us, not without reason, for the, to her, disastrous result. She will trade with us because she must. She will give us such concessions within her territory as she conceives will redound to her own benefit. She will make a treaty with us, but she will utilize to its utmost every advantage which her shrewd and unscrupulous diplomats can find in the conditions under which negotiations are carried on.

The one-sided operation of this joint resolution is illustrated by the conditions under which an American is admitted into Germany at present. He secures a passport to some neighboring neutral country and there applies to a German consul for a visé. This is extended or withheld, apparently without regard to rule, according to the whim of the officer, depending possibly on the degree of tolerance he has for Americans in general, on the state of the weather, or the vigor of his digestion. This legislation proposes that we let down all the bars to the entry of Germans while our people go through the humiliating procedure outlined to get into Germany, and it offers no remedy, the formal request to the President to negotiate a treaty that might improve matters having been withdrawn. There is absolutely nothing it can or does accomplish for this country. It should be entitled "A measure for the relief of the German people."

I now address myself to a few particular features of the joint resolution which either impugn the good faith of its framers or stamp it as having been unreflectingly drawn.

1. The joint resolution provides that all property of the German Government and its nationals which has—come into the possession or under the control of the Government of the United States or of any of its officers, agents, or employees, from any source or by any agency whatsoever, shall be retained by the United States, and no disposition thereof made except as shall specifically be hereafter provided by Congress until—a treaty is made, as hereinbefore referred to.

It is well known that most of the property seized by the United States is no longer in its possession, having been disposed of by the Alien Property Custodian. There remain the ships we seized. The joint resolution apparently suggests a treaty under which these are to be turned back to Germany when she has "given * * * undertakings and made provision by treaty" for the payment of losses suffered by American citizens by her acts, which treaty shall contain a most-favored nation clause and confirm the title in the United States to all property seized. When we get Germany's promise that she will pay our citizens we are to surrender to her the ships. There seems to be an inconsistency between the opening part of the proviso in section 1 and its conclusion. By the latter, the treaty contemplated is to confirm to the United States the title to all property seized, while by the introductory part so much as remains in the possession of the United States is to be surrendered to Germany upon her giving the undertaking to satisfy the claims of our citizens and consenting to a most-favored nation provision.

But if the ships are to be surrendered, as first suggested in the joint resolution, and not retained, as clearly implied in the concluding portion of the proviso, they are to be given upon Germany's promise to pay our citizens whatever obligations may be due them from her. But by the general treaty which Germany has entered into with our allies, now effective as between them and her, she has already bound herself to pay them in amounts which were fixed at what they thought was the limit of her ability to pay and which able economists, including the financial adviser of the American commission, insist exceeds her ability to pay. Upon a promise by Germany so bound to pay our citizens their just demands, we are to let the ships go.

But if apprehensions are aroused by the statements just made they may be dismissed, since by another provision of the treaty, the execution of which by Germany is a condition of the surrender, we are to be accorded most-favored nation treatment by her. But Germany is in no situation to make any such agreement with us or to carry it out should she unscrupulously undertake to do so. Her whole trade and taxing systems are practically controlled by the Reparation Commission, provided for in the Versailles treaty, whose business it is to see that every dollar that can be wrung out of Germany goes to the payment of the obligations for the liquidation of which it provides, and she has bound herself therein (art. 291) to "pass, issue, and maintain in force any legislation, orders, or decrees that may be necessary to give complete effect to these provisions," namely, those concerning reparation, by which she is practically placed in the hands of a receiver. By article 240 of the treaty Germany "agrees irrevocably to the possession and exercise by such commission of the power and authority given to it under the present treaty," and that it may be fully equipped to tell her what to do and what not to do, to the end that the purposes for which it was created may be accomplished, the Government of Germany, by the same article agrees to "supply the commission all the information which the commission may require relative to the financial situation and operations and to the property, productive capacity, and stock and current production of raw materials and manufactured articles of Germany and her nationals."

So vast are the powers of this Reparation Commission that provision was made by one of the 14 Lodge reservations as follows:

8. The United States understands that the reparation commission will regulate or interfere with exports from the United States to Germany, or from Germany to the United States, only when the United States by act or joint resolution of Congress approves such regulation or interference.
